Drive until you see a hill, and look for her car. Her house has no number on it, and mail is not delivered there; it goes to a P. Senate by less than 3, votes. The next year, state Republicans introduced the new law. Tribes fought it in court up until October 9, when the Supreme Court declined to support their appeal. Horonata Defender at the voter drive headquarters. Jihan Hafiz Tribal leaders contend that the state government has provided no meaningful support in ensuring that eligible Native voters will be able to overcome the new hurdle. On Thursday, North Dakota District Court Chief Judge Daniel Hovland denied a last-minute request for an emergency halt to enforcement of the new law in advance of the midterm elections. Ultimately, the pipeline was completed, and oil now flows under the Missouri River, long the primary drinking water source for the reservation. But it is not a campaign for Heitkamp, who remains a controversial figure on Standing Rock. Before that, she was a key supporter of ending the crude oil export ban, which helped fuel demand for a pipeline, and she has declined to stand up to the oil, gas, and coal industries in the face of the climate crisis. Notably, she was one of only two Democratic senators to vote in favor of confirming Scott Pruitt as administrator of the Environmental Protection Agency. But the stakes of having Native voices represented in the U. And in many ways, Heitkamp has been a rare advocate in Congress for Native Americans, spearheading efforts to address human trafficking and violence against women, and pushing for the creation of a commission to address issues facing Indigenous children. For Defender, the potential consequences for Native women of losing an advocate in the Senate are too great to place the weight of her political position on DAPL. But the even greater threat is that the new law will affirm a perception that Native people can remain invisible. Furniture that had been used by the Water Protectors Legal Collective, which provided representation to those arrested during the pipeline fight, was being pulled out of storage and repurposed. Long before she became involved in attempting to stop construction of the Dakota Access pipeline, Young co-founded the Women of All Red Nations arm of the American Indian Movement, or AIM, where she fought for the fulfillment of treaty rights and an end to forced sterilization of Indigenous women. In a community where people have always had to fight for survival under harmful U. Republican Kevin Cramer, currently a U. Many of the eligible voters the drive is targeting face challenges beyond just having the right address. Many people lack vehicles or cellphones. Young and her team have been spreading word that the tribe has waived the fee for issuing tribal IDs, offering them for free. North Dakota Secretary of State Al Jaeger has encouraged eligible voters who lack a residential address to request one through the system. In some cases, coordinators, who are often law enforcement officers, have simply been unavailable to respond to requests. The case of year-old plaintiff and Standing Rock member Terry Yellow Fat is an example of the chaotic situation facing reservation residents. He figured Buffalo was his street. Still, he decided to request an address from the coordinator, who happens to also be the county sheriff. To his surprise, the sheriff gave him an address on 92nd Street. Yet when he attempted to have UPS deliver a package there, the parcel never arrived. A delivery driver let him know that the address actually belongs to a nearby liquor store. Jaeger has declined to endorse it. OJ and Barb Semans at the voter drive headquarters. American Indians were only made full citizens of the U. Of course, the only counties that fit that description were Todd, Oglala at the time known as Shannon , and Washabaugh, which are located within the Rosebud and Pine Ridge reservations. That legacy is another barrier to getting Native voters to the polls. Defender said family members have told her stories of being turned away. At the close of voting day in , polls indicated that the Democratic Senate incumbent Tim Johnson had lost to his Republican opponent Jim Thune. But by morning, the scales had tipped by a meager votes. Barb Semans and her effort to get out the Native vote on the Rosebud Sioux reservation in South Dakota was credited for the narrow win. When you start talking about actually doing this to protect your treaties, people understood that and were willing to participate. The campaign demanded an extra hour and got it. Based on polls campaign workers took on the reservation, the couple estimates that the final hour may have tipped the scales. Altogether, hundreds of voters participated who had previously sat out the elections. Since then, Four Directions has sued officials in South Dakota, Montana, and Nevada to open new and accessible offices where tribal members can obtain and submit absentee ballots without traveling exceedingly long distances.
