The Year Old Man is a comedy sketch, originally created by Mel Brooks and Carl Reiner in Mel Brooks played the oldest man in the world, interviewed by Carl Reiner in a series of comedy routines that appeared on television, as well as being made into a collection of records.

Originally a comedy skit, created by Brooks and Reiner in after Brooks claimed that a bout of gout made him feel like a year-old man, the routine was later adapted as an animated television special in This book, based on transcripts from four sound recordings made by the authors, was released in In two thousand years, the greatest thing mankind ever devised, I think, in my humble opinion, is Saran Wrap. You can put a sandwich in it, you can look through it, you can touch it. You can put it over your face and fool around and everything. That was a good thing, space, finding space. There were a few racy parts that were either censored, or went over my head when I was younger: What did Onan invent? A very big invention. And he stayed with himself. And he lived with himself and he was in love. Was he ostracized for being that way? I mean was he shunned? Oh, yes, he was shunned because the Bible, it says, "Thou shalt not spill the seed of thy fruit on the ground," you know. And he was fruitless and subtracting, if you want to look at it that way. Did you know Paul Revere? He was a hero! No, he hated the Jews. No, no, he was a hero. How could you call him an anti-Semite? He warned us, he was afraid they were moving in, he had fear that they were going in the neighborhood, to move in. The Yiddish are coming! Were you living in that neighborhood at the time? I was there, I heard him myself. He was yelling, "The British are coming.
