So what is a CAFR? What does it report? It must be audited by an independent auditor using generally accepted government auditing standards. The CAFR consists of three sections: Introductory, Financial and Statistical. The Introductory section orients and guides the reader through the report. How is it different from a regular financial report or budget? A regular annual report typically presents only basic financial statements about the government. A CAFR, by contrast, presents a wider variety of important information intended to help the reader properly understand the basic statements. Do all governmental organizations file CAFRs? Many governments not required to issue a CAFR do so anyway because it represents a best practice in government finance. Who sets the rules for CAFRs? Do they change often? When developing proposals for new standards, GASB solicits feedback from the governmental accounting community through a variety of avenues, including public hearings, public forums, task forces and focus groups. The primary feedback mechanism, however, is a request for written comments from GASB, which anyone can submit. There is no single, central location for all government CAFRs. How can a lay reader quickly find the most useful items concerning financial health? A CAFR presents a wide variety of important information. The best way to locate debt information is to start with the table of contents and look for the following: May include outstanding debt or other overall debt information in a financial overview included in the letter of transmittal.
