

Chapter 1 : A Day in the Life of a Construction Worker - Heather Adamson - Google Books

This is what a day in the life of a construction worker can be like: Up bright and early, work clothes on, take hard hat and go to the site being worked on. Today's project is on a housing project so lots to do.

What keeps Singapore running like a well-oiled machine? The housekeepers, construction workers, dock workers, gardeners, street cleaners and countless other migrant workers who call Singapore home. Often invisible to the average eye. I sought to capture fragments of their experiences here, snapshots into their daily lives, by asking them what just one day is like in their shoes. Mirroring the individuality of their experiences here, I shot each of the interviewees with a different camera, with the results somewhat of a "gamble" -- a word many of my interviewees used to describe their own experience here in Singapore. This is the first of a two-part series. Davy, 41, domestic worker from the Philippines One in six homes in Singapore has domestic help, according to recent government figures, with Filipinas comprising around one-third of the , domestic workers who call the Little Red Dot home. Monday to Saturday, Davy, cooks, cleans and gardens for her employers, for whom she has been working for the past 16 years. But her "real" work lasts from 10 p. So I started reading to pass the time. Now, she has her own plans as an author: I talk to them every day, we tell each other everything, because when I see them at the end of every two-year contract, I am shocked. They actually told me not to buy them anything anymore, because they said I always get it wrong. When I move back to live there again, maybe in a couple of years, I think things will be different. Turn to page 2 to read about Shafiqul, a year-old, out-of-work Bangladeshi worker. Shafiqul, 36, out-of-work construction worker from Bangladesh Of the roughly 1. Former construction worker Shafiqul, 36, from Bangladesh, is currently seeking damages for an accident he incurred at work in His left shoulder was dislocated, his elbow torn open, and his spine twisted under the weight of the rubble. After being treated for his injuries at Singapore General Hospital SGH , Shafiqul was surprised to find his former boss -- along with "three Tamil gangsters" -- looking for him at midnight at his dormitory. Such scare tactics are a fairly common occurrence for many migrant workers in Singapore, according to charity TWC2. He is now awaiting medical compensation from his former employer, via a manpower ministry-appointed lawyer. This June, Shafiqul was readmitted to SGH for a second surgery, this one to fuse together two of his lower discs. One SGH staff member, speaking anonymously, said she she can admit around 10 to 15 migrant worker patients a day, many of them with "dodgy paperwork" issued by their former employers. Here, Shafiqul, who regularly sent money home to provide for his parents, siblings and new wife, does physical therapy exercises after the insertion of a centimeter metal rod in his lower spine. I cannot carry more than five kilos, doctor say, for the rest of my life," says Shafiqul. I want to go back home and start again. The photographs were shot with a Holga using 35mm film.
