A Students' Treasury of Texas Poetry is a fantastic collection of poetry. One amazing thing about the book is the wide range of poets. Just as Texas has varied climates and weather patterns--depending upon which part of the state you're in--Hill's collection includes the work of poets from extremely diverse backgrounds.

Younger children may prefer the illustrations by Wallace Tripp in the Putnam edition. Also by the author and illustrator: The Shooting of Dan McGrew. Two excellent collections of Service poetry: For a biographical profile of the poet, see Read All About It!. The Bite of the Gold Bug: Set against an urban background, the poems elicit both, joyous and bittersweet feelings. Below the surface it is an ingeniously entertaining study of metaphor: Fathers, Mothers, Sister, Brothers: A Collection of Family Poems. This collection is filled with the colorful, zany, weird and tender characters that make his poems for primary kids just right. The illustrations here by David McPhail are delicious icing on the cake. In prescribing these short verses "for children and their parents," this contemporary American humorist offers a two-point perspective: Also by the author: More Poems About School. Other Mother Goose collections include: Related books about food: Poet Jack Prelutsky recognizes here that the common language of all children is laughter and wonder. The selected poems from traditional as well as contemporary poets are short--but long on laughter, imagery, and rhyme, and grouped around fourteen categories that include food, goblins, nonsense, home, children, animals, and seasons. Covering the seasons, holidays, animals, and lullabies, the 57 poems also include several of the classic narrative poems for young children like "Poor Old Lady," "The House That Jack Built," and "A Visit from St Nicholas. Sing a Song of Popcorn: Thus both the sounds and sights in this book make it outstanding. The titles alone are enough to bring children to rapt attention:
