Scope and Content This collection contains the personal, political and literary papers of Richard Acland. The collection includes the following: He was educated at Rugby School and Balliol College, Oxford, where he read philosophy, politics and economics. He then served as a lieutenant in the Royal North Devon Yeomanry. He stood unsuccessfully as a Liberal candidate for Torquay in , and for Barnstaple in , finally winning the latter seat in . By the start of the Second World War, he had moved from conventional Liberalism towards a Christian socialist concern for the transformation of the privileged world in which he had grown up. Together with the author J. Priestley, he brought together the Forward March movement and members of the Committee to form the Common Wealth Party in July . This party adopted a manifesto which was socialist, calling for public ownership and morality in politics. In defiance of the Labour-Conservative truce during the Second World War, it fielded candidates against the Government and succeeded in returning three Members of Parliament in by-elections. Acland led the party to its by-election victories: However, after widespread defeat in the post-war General Election of , when only one Common Wealth Party member was returned, Acland resigned. The Party was dissolved, with many of its members joining Labour. Acland married the architect Anne Stella Alford in , and the couple had four sons. He resigned his seat in in protest against the development of the H-bomb, becoming senior lecturer at St. He continued to write on education matters and world peace until his death at Broadclyst, Devon, in .
