

Chapter 1 : Administration on Aging - Wikipedia

About the Administration on Aging (AoA) The Administration on Aging (AOA) is the principal agency of the U.S Department of Health and Human Services designated to carry out the provisions of the Older Americans Act of (OAA), as amended (42 U.S.C.A. Â§ et seq.).

Under the Older Americans Act, the Administration on Aging AoA is designated as the federal focal point and advocate agency for older persons. AoA works closely with a nationwide network of tribal, state, and local programs on aging to plan, coordinate, and develop community-level systems of services that meet the unique needs of older persons and their caregivers. Programs are targeted to older Americans in the greatest economic and social need, with particular attention to low-income minorities and individuals residing in rural areas. The Aging Service Provider Network includes 56 state and territorial units on aging, area agencies on aging, tribal organizations, and 29, service providers. The health-related programs include the national Elderly Nutrition Program that provides congregate and home-delivered meals to more than 2. The program is intended to improve the dietary intakes of participants and to offer opportunities to form new friendships and to create informal support networks. The program also provides nutrition screening, assessment, education, and counseling to help older participants meet their health and nutrition needs, which may include special health assessments for such diseases as hypertension and diabetes. The preventive health service program targets the medically underserved areas of each state where large numbers of elderly with the greatest economic need for services reside. Services include health risk assessments and screenings e. The program provided assistance in accessing services to approximately , caregivers, significantly exceeding the agency target of , caregivers. It served almost , caregivers with counseling and training services and provided respite to more than 70, caregivers. Also, the Native American and American Indian tribal organizations have a program where at least 4, caregivers received one or more caregiver support services. Ten grantees were selected, and these sites represented local programs that were large and small; were urban, rural, and suburban; were racially and ethnically diverse; and included individuals with mobility problems. Programs were implemented in a variety of settings, such as senior centers, senior housing, and community centers. Approximately to older adults finished the program. The Center is in the final stages of data compilation and analysis. Preliminary results indicate that there were significant changes in nutrition, physical activity, and stages of change. The partnership involves a variety of federal agencies and private foundations that are coordinating their efforts to help implement evidence-based prevention programs through aging-services providers at the community level. The areas of focus include disease self-management, nutrition, physical activity, falls prevention, and medication management. The Evidence-Based Prevention Program for the Elderly grants are in their second year of a three-year cycle. Area agencies on aging also fund a wide range of home- and community-based services that are non-health-related, such as access, in-home, and home repair, which assist older persons in their efforts to remain in their own homes. AoA funds a toll-free service 1â€™â€™â€™ to assist callers with information about programs and services in their own community. AoA maintains a website that contains information for professionals and consumers: NW, Room Washington.
