Using the Sulky Iron-on Transfer Pens is pretty simple. First, print your design on regular computer paper. I just used regular printer paper from my computer. You get a much cleaner transfer on ironed, wrinkle-free fabric. In fact, picking up the iron and putting it back down is out of the question, too, or I may end up with a fuzzy image or a shifted duplicate on the fabric. Generally, I pin iron-on transfers when I use them. Quilters may be familiar, though, with a spray on adhesive that dissolves with heat, and apparently, you can spray your pattern with this, and then adhere it onto the fabric and do the iron on. This is not necessarily the best way to get a good transfer. For one thing, there are those little steam holes that can cause interference with the heat, and for another, not all iron surfaces heat equally from tip to base. Just pick it up and press it down. The transfer came out pretty well, considering my limitations with moving the iron. You can see that the top of the pattern is quite crisp. The lines are relatively thick. You can gauge the thickness of your line when you trace the pattern, by applying less pressure on the pen, a lighter touch in your tracing, and by moving the pen quickly across the surface of the paper. But even on the areas where I went with as thin a line as I could draw, the transfer line is still relatively thick. This means that, when the piece is embroidered, the stitches are going to have to be heavy enough to cover the line, as the transfer is permanent. The pens come in 8 colors. Remember that the color transfer will be permanent. The pens work well with a ruler, if you want to draw straight lines. How about some orange tulips? The cap is a bright, bright orange, so I was surprised at the dullness of the ink. But when ironed, the ink brightens up quite a bit. And some green leaves and a green hill! On the other hand – keeping in mind that the transfer is permanent – you might want a lighter transfer for your hand embroidery projects. More on what will become of the tulips, later! They work well, and certainly a lot better than other iron-on transfer pencils out there the red pencils are not that impressive, in my opinion. Iron-on transfers are not my favorite way of getting a design on fabric, but if I were going to use this method of transfer, I think these pens work really well. I could see using these for flour sack towels and so forth – and especially for hand drawn designs say, by kids – kid art would be a lot of fun! Have you used these pens before? Any opinion on them? Any suggestions for other uses? Feel free to leave a comment!
