In April the History Channel had its highest ratings ever, bolstered by a runaway hit, now among the top 10 shows on cable. In a matter of months, stars Mike Wolfe and Frank Fritz have turned a word once reserved for trash collectors and hoarders into a television phenomenon. Trash to Treasure "A picker is someone who finds good stuff among the rust," Fritz says. Not bad for an idea Wolfe says he tried to pitch for four years, shooting homemade episodes with Fritz using a small video camera. When he showed his "pilots" to executives at History, Wolfe says they knew they had a hit. Now "picking" has turned Wolfe and Fritz, a couple of middle-aged, blue collar antiques collectors from Iowa into an overnight sensation. When "Nightline" caught up with the "pickers" during a recent trip to St. Louis, they were recognized everywhere, even in the lobby of the Holiday Inn Express, where the duo crashed for the night. I mean I had tears in my eyes! Louis steel mill, shooting an episode for the second season of the show. Their camera crew followed as the pickers rummaged through the property, offering the owners money for anything they thought could be resold to antiques dealers and collectors for a profit. He says antique dealers and decorators will pay top dollar for this stuff. There the guys have been swamped with tips from viewers on where to find hidden treasures. Colby-Cushman says the success of "Pickers" is thanks in part to the dynamic personalities of Wolfe and Fritz, and nostalgia for simpler times. In Pennsylvania they discovered "mole man," a collector who stacks up antiques in his room underground lair. Wolfe and Fritz say the experience was their most dangerous yet, as they climbed through narrow tunnels and a maze built with 1, old doors. Wolfe says it took some convincing to get their camera crew to go with them. Swindlers or Smart Shoppers? Not everyone is sold on American Pickers. The broadcast has polarized the antiques community, with critics accusing the pickers of taking advantage of elderly collectors, low-balling them for their keepsakes. Several blogs have been trashing the pickers. And what about those porcelain sign letters?
