Medical Marijuana at Assisted Living? My mom lives in Portland, Oregon. She also has glaucoma and is a breast cancer survivor. My mom is a medical marijuana patient. She believes marijuana helped her survive cancer, and she says it helps immensely with her MS and glaucoma. She has been living in her house with help from me and other family members who drop in on occasion, but she really needs assisted living. As she is medical marijuana patient who smokes three to five joints daily, can you tell me if assisted living communities accept her? The medical value of marijuana is now widely recognized, and it can be used to alleviate many of the ailments associated with old age. The New York Times recently wrote about this very issue, suggesting that providers are generally doing their best to accommodate medical marijuana patients, but are handling the matter on a case by case basis. There are some practical problems providers have to deal with when considering the needs of a resident medical marijuana patient. The Smoke Problem First of all there is the matter of smoke. If the community permitted it, outdoor medication may be possible at some communities, but it would likely be impractical for your mother to go in and out at all hours of the day, especially with the damp Portland weather, and with her mobility and vision problems to boot. There are alternatives to smoking. She may be able to use a vaporizer, which heats marijuana to a point where the primary active ingredients THC, cannabidiol within are vaporized, while the plant matter itself is not burned or even charred. It is possible that the community would allow your mother to use a vaporizer to medicate inside her apartment. While vaporizing produces no smoke, it can create a faint odor which other residents may find unpleasant or disruptive. Then the issue of smoke and odors is out of the picture entirely. Some medical marijuana patients swear by edibles, but others do not like them because they cannot control or titrate their dose as easily with smoked marijuana. Finally, she could also talk to her doctor about switching to synthetic pharmaceutical THC Marinol , but medical marijuana patients often find this to be too strong, and have the same issues that some patients report with edibles " that they cannot control their dose so that they have just the right amount instead of too much. Another reason medical marijuana patients have not been keen to switch to synthetic THC is that the combination of active compounds in marijuana work together to provide a synergistic medical affect that is lacking in when THC is ingested in isolation. Cannabidiol is not present in Marinol. Medical Marijuana Patients Should Talk to Staff Before a Move When you are exploring assisted living communities, you or your mother should talk about your needs straight away. Bringing the issue up after your mother has already moved in would not be a good idea. Best wishes, We welcome your comments below.
