In fact, for most men, going bald is a long and slow process that can take anywhere from a few short years to several decades. One of the keys to stopping hair loss is noticing the signs of baldness and taking acting as early as possible. Luckily, there are some real signs of male pattern baldness that you can use to identify and deal with hair loss. Noticeable change in your hairline The most obvious sign of balding is a noticeable change in your hairline that you can clearly see in photographs. Baldness often begins in the hairline, with the flat or mildly receded hairline you previously had turned into a more obvious V-shaped hairline. For most people, this begins around the temples and often starts with thinning rather than total hair loss. One important thing to be aware of is that lighting conditions can affect the appearance of your hairline. This makes it important to compare photos with similar lighting conditions, not one photo taken in natural light and another taken in bright artificial light. Noticeable thinning of your hair Not all people go bald from their hairline. Just like a receding hairline, the easiest way to spot diffuse thinning is to compare photos from different time periods. Hair loss can occur due to many causes , ranging from travel-induced jetlag to sunburn, weight loss or fever. You might also notice loose hairs on your pillow in the morning. If you notice a large amount of hair loss every day for a long period of time, you should seek out help. What not to look for The three signs above are good indicators that you should think about taking action to stop your hair loss. An itchy scalp, which is usually caused by dry, irritated skin or excessive amounts of sebum, neither of which contribute to long-term hair loss.
