His arms met cool sheets and empty space. He opened his eyes and threw back the covers. Iron strength gripped Yuzo from behind, pinning his arms to his body. Yuzo thrashed and twisted but the hand over his mouth had a cloth Lead filled his body. His eyelids shuttered and everything went black Something heavy pressed on his eyelids. He opened his mouth to yell but the same pressure filled his mouth. Seconds passed before he realized his tongue was resting against the fuzz of cloth. The reality slammed through the blackness. What the hell was happening? His heart began to race and sweat erupted on his skin, heating it and whatever he was lying on. He tried to shift his body, tried to get up. More restraints squeezed his wrists and ankles. He was trussed up like a chicken for the slaughter. He heaved several breaths around the gag and forced himself to relax. He had to know by now that Yuzo was missing. Just to wait and survive until then. Yuzo listened for sounds. The occasional honk of a car horn punctuated the quiet. The low rumble of an airplane passing over. The air smelled like fish frying in oil. Footsteps sounded from a small distance and he heard the click of a door being opened. He caught his breath, his body tensed like wires. Was this fucking possible? He grunted and pulled against the bonds.

White Tiger is much more than a love-hotel for gay men, in which Kiku and his followers practice and embrace spiritual enlightenment through sex. It is the sanctuary for young gay men trying to escape the Yakuza's brutal clutches.

Source What Tigers Mean When it comes to animal tattoos, the tiger ranks up there with the best of them. Tigers have been a part of fashion, magic acts, and carnivals for years. Their beautiful stripes make them very attractive in fashion, art, and tattoos. Although the lion is considered to be the king of the jungle, it is actually the tiger. The largest percentage of tigers live in the dense jungles of Asia. The beauty and symbolism of the tiger has made it a highly sought-after tattoo. The Bengal and Siberian tigers are absolutely beautiful animals. The Bengal is orange with black stripes, while the Siberian is white with black stripes. They are deadly jungle predators. The humans who still live in the jungles where these tigers roam have to be on constant alert for them. The tiger has played a very important role in Asian cultures, such as China and Japan. In these cultures, the tiger ranks right up there with the dragon. You may also see tiger tattoos that actually have a dragon. Japanese Samurai had tigers on their crests. As you have already read, the tiger is an endangered animal. Due to this fact, the tiger tattoo has become very important for those who care about the tiger species and conservation. These people wear the tiger tattoo with pride as a reminder of their work. As of today, there are only a few thousand left in the entire world. The species became endangered after people had been hunting them for their fur. The tiger can be portrayed in a variety of different ways. Some show it with a calm expression, while others may show it looking fierce. Many show the tiger in the jungle. Some tiger tattoos will only portray the head of the tiger and others show the entire body. Click thumbnail to view full-size Tiger head by Steve Byrne.

Around him, the flashbulbs of the crime scene photographers went off like tiny fireworks. His hands already encased in latex gloves, he pressed his palms together, steepled in front of him, and bowed his respect to the dead. As did his partner, Natsuka Yamamoto, beside him. The victims of this third killing in nearly six months, their naked, stiffening bodies still intertwined, had been skewered. Natsuka delicately covered the victims with a white cloth then approached Toshi, shaking his head sadly. The katana tented the cloth in the most macabre way. Forensics had already done the preliminary, time and cause of death. No smoking on a crime scene. Natsuka nodded and went to give the order. He began to look around. Not one crime scene had turned up any useful leads. All they had so far in all this time was that the form of the murders was identical and that the victims were either married people having an illicit affair or a couple together whose relationship was rocky. As good a motive as any. Autopsies showed that the wounds were self-inflicted moments before death. Men and women, both in service jobs, both solitary types. Profiling had gotten them that far. And only that far. Where were they getting the damned swords? The murder weapons turned out to be original swords smithed by one Koto Naomasa, one of the great sword smiths of nineteenth century Japan. They seemed to be coming out of thin air. The case was nothing but dead ends, literally and figuratively. Somewhere in the shadows, another Charles Manson was sending out his brainwashed minions to kill. Natsuka went to round up the hotel staff and to have the manager contact off-duty employees to come in for questioning. As always, the room yielded no clues. It seemed the killer did what he always did. Entered the room, unnoticed by the lovers engaged in the act, speared them together then turned around and left. There was nothing to do now except wait for forensic reports and to speak with the staff. Toshi watched the sheet-covered stretcher being carried out of the room. He shook his head, fighting down a wave of nausea. The sick feeling was as much from frustration as from horror. How the hell was he supposed to prevent further murders if the killer continued to slip through their fingers like sand on the beach? If he and Natsuka had been the only ones working on this case, he might have understood the difficulty of turning up leads, but a team of twenty men and women working around the clock? His cell phone rang. Toshi pulled off a glove and retrieved the phone from his pocket. One glance at the ID window showed the caller was his superior. He took a deep breath. Same situation as always? Hunting a serial killer did not allow one time for such trivialities as personal grooming. It was a terrible response, but the only one he had in the moment. He, himself, lived in this area and had a vested interest in keeping it safe. Leave the other teams to finish the inquiries and come in. I have something to tell you. With the crime scene now secured, he and Natsuka would have to come back in and search the place again in the morning. Which was really only a few hours away. Good thing there was a Starbucks right by the station. Natsuka was at the doorway of the room, looking at him. So far, no one here has seen or heard anything suspicious. Management is still looking for all the off-duty employees. He followed the older man down the hall, into the elevator. His own father, a high-ranking diplomat, had always been stern and distant, demanding perfection. Mazao Genjin hated that his son was a policeman. Policing was a job for the son of blue collar men, as he had put it from his place across the table at dinner so many years ago. Not for the son of a diplomat and descendant of a samurai family. As if such social ranks still applied to modern day society. All that personal freedom and "well" Michael, had gotten into his blood. But honestly, it was his own doing. Or, rather his nature. So, here he was. Halfway down to the lobby, he realized his body had already begun to tense, bracing himself for what the chief would have to say. He stared at the screen. Police were loading sheet-covered corpses, apparently two bodies together, into the medical van outside of what appeared to be a fancy hotel. The top of the sheet protruded upward, attesting to the sword. It was obvious the killer had skewered his victims together. Police have been frustrated in the efforts to capture the Ronin Killer before his next strike. Their only clue is the manner in which two victims are killed at once, either in an embrace or during sexual intercourse. He continued to watch the footage. They refused to comment on the string of murders. They were leaving the building. A middle-aged, shorter man walked in front of the other detective, seeming to shield him, but the cameras managed to catch glimpses of the second detective. A few seconds sufficed for John to see that the younger man was slim and handsome. John watched the screen, his gaze glued on the taller figure of the young detective until he was no longer visible. The segment ended and John switched off the set. He shook his head. There was a time when he would have immediately booked a flight to Tokyo and turned up at the police station, offering his services to catch the killer. Hell, that Japanese detective was almost good-looking enough to pull him from his rest cure. His hands had only stopped shaking in the last week. He pushed the image of that guy from his mind, fighting back the nagging spirals of heat whispering about in his long-neglected groin area. John Holmes filled his days with walks in the park, counseling at the VA, and whatever leisure and athletic activities would keep him fit between reading trashy detective novels and staring into space. No antique stores for him, nor any other place where the lives of the dead could crash in on him. No touching other people so he could experience all their grief and anguish and learn their deepest secrets. He was resting until his own soul told him he was ready again. The private, unlisted number that only his agent, Dick Watson had, not even his own family. It had also been worth his peace of mind to invest in an agent to run interference with police stations, press and general curiosity mongers and tire kickers. He propped his bare feet up on the glass coffee table. She wants you to come to dinner soon. The pressure of a post-traumatic stress disorder suffering psychic as a lover had been too much for the guy. Brett had secrets that, when John touched him, were no longer secrets. He definitely appreciated when someone else did the cooking. Baked beans from a can got awfully tiresome after a while. Dick cleared his throat. How many cases could be solved if he just helped? Dick was shrewd and prudent and John trusted him implicitly. Have you started watching the news again? This was going to be a doozy. This was too damn weird. And about five minutes ago, I got a call from the superintendent of that district, asking, no pleading, for your services. The victims are found slain with the sword. Their fingerprints match the fingerprints on the murder weapon each time. So far the police have not been able to establish a connection.
