Coins struck at Philadelphia bear no mintmark; those struck at San Francisco were marked with an S. At this time, the Lincoln cent had not yet become dominant in circulation; four-fifths of the cents in circulation were of the older Indian Head design. Demand for the cent continued to increase when a luxury tax was instituted, and cents were needed to make change. At the time, dies were only made at Philadelphia; the Denver Mint had outstanding orders for cents that year. When Denver applied to the Philadelphia Mint for more dies cents were not struck at either Philadelphia or San Francisco that year, it was told that the Philadelphia Mint could supply no more cent dies, as it was fully engaged in preparing dies for the Peace dollar. Denver filled its orders by striking with a worn-out obverse die, which impressed the design fainter than usual. The plain piece is another relatively rare one in the Lincoln cent series. Beginning in 1909, proof coins were struck for collectors for the first time since 1854. Made only at Philadelphia, these pieces were coined from dies polished to mirror smoothness. Experiments were carried out by several corporations under contract from the Mint; they tested various metallic and non-metallic substances, including fiber, tempered glass, and several types of plastic. These experiments used various designs, since actual Lincoln cent dies could not leave government custody. Another common complaint was confusion with the dime, and some letters suggested that a hole be punched in the center of the new coins. Morgenthau responded that the new pieces would soon become darker, and that the Mint would be willing to darken them if it could figure out a suitable process. The Treasury also stated that some of the metal for the new coins would be obtained by melting down small arms ammunition shells. These pieces may be distinguished from genuine off-metal strikes by the use of a magnet. The Mint was aware of the pieces, and knew they were somewhere within a large production lot, but opted to release them, rather than destroy the entire lot. The variety did not become widely known until several years later. The new design, by Frank Gasparro, had been developed by the Treasury in consultation with the Lincoln Sesquicentennial Commission. Anderson, the new design featured the Lincoln Memorial in Washington, D. The redesign came as a complete surprise, as word of the proposal had not been leaked. Gasparro did not go in person to see the Lincoln Memorial, a place he had never visited. According to Anderson, Gasparro created an "impressive" image of the Memorial, [57] however, Taxay states that the design "looks at first glance like a trolley car". The Mint feared the interior of the zero as punched into the die would break away during the coining process, giving the zero a filled-in appearance. To reduce the chance of this happening, the Mint enlarged the date. Prices for the small date coins, of which approximately two million had been struck at Philadelphia, continued to increase until 1909, when the bubble burst. With change short, hoarding extended to the cent, which also became scarce in circulation. Mint Director Eva Adams felt that part of the reason for the shortage was coin collectors taking pieces from circulation, and Adams ordered that mintmarks no longer appear on coins. Coins continued to be dated until the end of 1909, using authority given by the Coinage Act of 1864, and almost all cents were actually struck in 1909. Although coinage had been stopped at San Francisco after 1906, the California facility began to issue cents again, though without mintmarks. San Francisco began minting a limited number of circulation strikes [65] which it would cease to do after [66] and began striking proof coins. For the coins a new master was produced for use in all three mints and the features were sharpened and moved further from the edge of the coin, while the lettering was broadened. The Mint decided to switch to an aluminum cent. Over a million and a half such pieces were struck in the second half of 1909, though they were dated 1908. At congressional hearings, representatives of the vending machine industry testified that aluminum cents would jam their equipment, and the Mint backed away from its proposal. Slated for disposal, when a bag of them tore open before going into a smelter a few were kept by the workers. They are also considered to be illegally held government property. After contract difficulties and production delays, the first such cents were struck at the West Point Mint without mintmark on January 7, 1909. Denver did not convert to the new composition until October 1909. Birth and early childhood in Kentucky: It was designed by Richard Masters and sculpted by Jim Licaretz. It was designed and
