

Chapter 1 : Scholarships | Blairs

"I have lived in several apartment buildings and The Blairs is not just an apartment building. It is a real community run by an efficient, friendly, professional staff that makes life easier for residents."

BBC March 6, To intervene or not to intervene? That is the question increasingly on the minds of world leaders at the start of the 21st Century. It is highly unlikely that the UN would want to go too far down the interventionist path. The UN exists to try to make individual action unnecessary. And to some a doctrine of international community is a doctrine of international interference. It followed the worldwide guilt felt at the failure by the UN, or anyone else, to intervene in Rwanda. Now Mr Blair wants to take the process further. International terrorism post September and the spread of weapons of mass destruction require a further redefinition of the rights of a nation-state, he argued in a speech on Friday. He even mentioned the Treaty of Westphalia in That basically ended the religious wars in Europe and began the modern system of the nation-state, whose rights, he suggested, should be further curtailed. He wondered whether international law should not be developed to avoid situations where "a regime can systematically brutalise and oppress its people and there is nothing anyone can do, when dialogue, diplomacy and even sanctions fail, unless it comes within the definition of a humanitarian catastrophe". Tony Blair in fact first mentioned his doctrine of international community and world figures like to be known for their doctrines in a speech in Chicago in It was at the time of the Kosovo war. He outlined five rules for intervention - be sure of your case, exhaust all other options first, ask if military operations can be "sensibly" undertaken, prepare for the long-term and identify if your interests are involved. Ideally, Mr Blair suggested in both speeches, the UN would lead the way. But the implication is that individual countries should act if the UN did not. His problem of course is that "intervention" for some is "aggression" for others. His speech is also under attack from his critics for being too much of a justification of the war in Iraq. It will report this December. There are 16 members of the committee, an array of the international great and the good and some say the deja vu. It is not a panel likely to recommend pre-emptive military action. Lord Hannay pointed out that there were "different perceptions" about what a threat was in different parts of the world. To some, poverty and Aids were the problem, not terrorism. This article means that the UN can take its own collective pre-emptive action - and of a military kind. It could one day declare that, say North Korea, is a "threat to the peace. If the UN does not act, they argue, then individual states may do so themselves. That in turn would be a long way from Article 2 of the UN Charter which says:
