Other than the beer and peanut vendors, you could probably hear a pin drop. If we can somehow manage to scratch out a single run, Keith, then I think everyone would be perfectly happy to stick around for extra innings. I find myself looking for excuses to climb it. Anyway, Judge, gloves adjusted, has settled into the box. Probably not the results he was expecting coming in. How could you not? It only took a few innings of watching one violent fastball after another, however, to wash those away unfortunately. Whatever it is he does to get that ball moving, he just put his seventy-eighth pitch across the plate at one-hundred and sixty-five miles per hour. There was a lot of excitement in that club-house before the game—but after a few innings of seeing what this guy was throwing at them; it was almost as though they knew they were going to lose before the first run was scored. It started in the dugout and slowly spread through this crowd, stifling even the most rambunctious fans. With only two outs left to try and even this thing up, Willie Gellstar, steps to the plate. Thanks for staying on top of things for us. If you think about it—it really is kind-of hard to believe. On paper, this looks like the greatest team ever assembled on one field. While Praxus has been using the same appendage to pitch with each time, his other two—what did we decide to call them—tentacles? Anyway, his other two do an outstanding job concealing the ball. All of the waving and flopping that they produce—as well as whatever the hell those things are dangling from his head—can be very disorientating. I have a cat though. Cats are really top-notch. Gellstar watches as strike one sails past him. Wow—that pitch came in at a mere one hundred and twenty miles per hour. He just kind-of flopped his way out to the mound and started throwing bullets. If you recall—in his pre-game interview Willie said his motivation in this game was coming from his mother and younger sister. Tanaka Hirito, who has been, arguably, the greatest hitter to ever play Japanese professional baseball is taking deliberate cuts in the on-deck circle, in no obvious rush to put himself in the box as he prepares to take the place of fellow Japanese MLB all-star, Shohei Ohtani. How do you feel about those? Well, it looks like Hirito is finally ready to take his cuts. That pitch was around one-fifteen. I think some people are—wailing. I could probably do with a little cathartic wailing myself about now. We are down to our final strike ladies and gentlemen. I love you, old buddy. I will miss this time—maybe more than anything. Resistors will be automatically placed on their menu list. If, however, you find yourself on this list—unray as astfay as ooyah ancay and idehay. Hopefully our audience can read between the lines. In all honesty—does it really matter? Tanaka will have won the game with a home run to dead center field as Praxus watches the ball sail over his head. It was too quick to see and even the umpires are going to have to go to the replays just to see what just transpired. Another one of those long, black, snake-like tentacles seems to have rocketed out of the area we were all assuming to be their derrieres with speed beyond what our normal eyes could perceive and plucked the ball from the air just before it cleared the center field fence. I would expect the suicides to rate in the thousands before most folks even make it back to their cars. I guess we should go ahead and sign off before the real carnage begins. What do you think Ron? Just a couple of words before we send this back to Marcus and the team in the studio: Unfortunately, it would appear that the perennial all-star has passed away—killed by a pitch that shattered his entire ribcage at the age of thirty-nine. If you live in North America, please make sure that you and your families report to your nearest processing office by next Monday for your detention camp assignments.

IGN64 goes deep into Bottom of the 9th. The Facts Full MLB Players Association License allowing for more than real players Multiple gameplay modes including Exhibition, Season, and Training recommended for beginners Updated rosters and statistics Scenario simulations from recent baseball seasons Two players support Memory Pak compatible Gameplay Bottom of the 9th is a challenging game which is always a good thing for a baseball sim. Likewise on defense you have to realize that your players seem to lumber over to the ball but can fire a bullet just in time to make a play. All-Star Baseball has its own pace as does Ken Griffey. Bottom of the 9th has its own intricacies to get used to, but nothing about it takes away from its translation of baseball. Anybody who plays baseball will tell you that hitting a pitched ball with a bat is one of the toughest tasks in all of sports. Bottom of the 9th seems particularly attached to that notion, for better or worse. The pitcher-batter interface is clear and easy to figure out, but the batting icon can be very slippery and hard to control. Even in the training mode, where you know the location and type of pitch on the way, it can still be a mystery as to how to hit safely. Difficulty hitting is significant but not necessarily a negative thing. Mastering the batting method will add quite a bit to the replay value. You can put yourself in tight situations on offense or defense where you have to pull out a miracle to win the game or make a play to save the win in hand. You play as Sammy Sosa trying to knock a homerun of his own in the late innings of that game. Graphics Bottom of the 9th is not going to get by on its good looks because it has none. The texture of the uniforms look so soft and fuzzy that you may think it looks terrible. Or, you just might love it because it looks like cloth. Even the New York Apollo League team Yankees is missing the pinstripes on their home uniforms and they look no sharper. The stadiums are strong suggestions of real Major League ballparks but like the teams themselves they look intentionally vague. The Green Monster at "Fenway Park" looks about 40 feet too low. So, the lack of an MLB license not only takes away some realism from Bottom of the 9th but it also seems to have led to less attention to the overall graphic presentation. The crappy exteriors do a disservice to the nice animations and movements of the players. But it is nice to see batters hang their heads down as they trudge to the dugout after grounding into a double play. Sound The music is pretty endearing. The transitions between innings feel like a television broadcast going to commercial with the music sting and everything. The announcing is reactionary, pertinent and accurate, but never mentions any players by name. A wild throw from an infielder will bring a disgusted, "What was he thinking? And now the pitch. That lack of creativity would get you kicked out of broadcasting school. Crowd reactions are appropriate but not overwhelming. I especially like the fan who waits for it to get quiet while a home player is batting and then lets loose with a distracting whistle. The Controller Pak is needed to save your game stats.

This is an amazing opportunity for us - and an incredible time to be a fan of both companies! As always, I appreciate the continued love and support from our Kickstarter family. Chris Risks and challenges As with any project that involves the production and manufacture of a good to be delivered, there is certainly a real chance for hiccups, delays and more than one or two gremlins gumming up the works along the way. Many boardgame projects on Kickstarter have been seriously hampered by art production delays, problems with an overseas factory, missing units and one shipping snafu after another. Luckily, we have a few projects under our belt, and have dealt with many of those snafus and gremlins along the way. We have a good working relationship with our overseas manufacturer and have become accustomed to their protocols, communication styles and general idiosyncrasies. We try to plan for all contingencies, and have worked through - and learned from - kinks we may have encountered in our past projects. Sometimes even personal life events can blindsides you. But what we do promise is that we will hold ourselves to the same high standards we expect from other board game publishers, and we will be completely honest and open with each of you every step of the way. Questions about this project?
