The whole interior screamed modernityâ€™ ironic, really, Vicky found herself thinking, as the man who ran this whole mega-corporate shebang was as antediluvian as a dinosaur. A big, vicious dinosaur that ripped your throat out with its talons, tore you limb from limb, and then went on its way, searching for other prey to dismember. In her head she could again hear that deep, dangerously accented voice, carving into her with a cold, vicious fury that had stripped the flesh from her bones with savage economy. She could hear the words, too, ugly and foul, not caring how they slayed her, his fathomless eyes pools of loathing andâ€™ worse than loathingâ€™ contempt. Then, having verbally dismembered her, he had simply walked out of her life. She had not seen him since. And yet today, this morning, right now, she was going to walk up to that reception desk she could see coming closer and closer, walk up to that svelte, immaculate female sitting there watching her approach, and ask to see him. She felt her throat spasm. Protest sliced in her head. But her nervous feet kept on walking, ringing on the marble. She had to do it. Letters had been returned, all phone calls blocked, all e-mails deleted unread. Theo Theakis had absolutely no intention of letting her get close enough to ask him for what she wanted. Even as she replayed the thought in her mind, she felt a spurt of anger. To her grim chagrin, however, the law did not see it that way. What she wanted was not, as her lawyer had sympathetically but regretfully informed her, hers to have, let alone dispose of. Her face darkened now as she closed in on the reception desk. Well, her clothes at least should pass muster in these palatial corporate surroundings. Her suit might be well over a year out of date fashion-wise, but its designer label status was obvious to anyone with an eye for couture. And now this rare remnant of that vast wardrobe she had once had at her indifferent disposal was finally coming in useful. It was getting her the attentive focus of someone who was standing in the way of what she wanted. It was hard, though, given the mixture of apprehension and anger that was biting away inside her. So she simply stood there, as poised as she could, knowing that the pale ice-blue dress and jacket she was wearing was perfectly cut, and that the thin silver necklace went with it flawlessly, as did her high-heeled shoes and handbag, which were both colour co-ordinated. Her hair, newly washed and styledâ€™ albeit by herself, not a top hairdresserâ€™ flicked neatly out at the ends, and was drawn off her forehead by a hairband the exact colour as the rest of her outfit. She looked, she knew, expensive, classic, English andâ€™ oh, dear God, pleaseâ€™ sufficiently appropriate to get past this hurdle. Right, time to do itâ€™ now. In a deliberately poised voice, she spoke. She made her tones slightly more cultured than she usually bothered to do. But this was England, and these things counted. She gave the name as though it were something she did every day, as a matter of course. As if, equally as a matter of course, her giving it were not in the slightest exceptional and would always meet with compliance. Was it going to happen now? She must not let any uncertainty show in her face. Vicky could tell that she was staying neutral at this point, but that she had conceded that it was indeed possible that this designer-dressed female might actually be someone allowed that level of access. Might even, unlikely though it was, given the restraint of her appearance, be a female granted the privilege of personal intimacy with Theo Theakis. But Vicky also knew, feeling another bite of her tightly leashed anger at having to be here at all, that she did not look nearly voluptuously delectable enough to be one of his legion of mistresses. Vicky gave a small, poised smile. Theo Theakis sat back in his leather executive chair and felt his blood pressure spike. She was here, downstairs, in this very building. She had walked into his company, his territory, daring to do so! She must be mad to be so stupid as to come within a hundred miles of him! Shame was not a word she knew. No, she neither knew or felt any of those things. No hesitation, no compunction, no remorse. And now she had the effrontery to turn up and ask to see him. As though she had any right to do so. That woman had no rights to anythingâ€™ let alone what he knew she was here for. And certainly no rightâ€™ his eyes flashed with a dangerous, dark anger that went deep to the heart of himâ€™ no right at all, to call herself what she still did. His wife. Vicky sat on one of the dark grey leather sofas that were arranged neatly around a smoked glass table. With a fragment of her brain that was still functioning normally she started to read the headline that was visible. But at least it gave her mind something to do—something other than just going round and round in an ever-tightening loop. I ought to just stand up and walk out. Not sit here like a lemon with some insane idea of door-stepping him when he leaves! It was pointless just continuing to sit here, with her stomach tying itself in knots and her feet slowly starting to ache in their unaccustomed high-heeled shoes. But I want what I came for. Determination gave strength to her expression. Cheated of what she had been promised—what she needed. Needed now, two years later, with imperative urgency. She could afford to wait no longer. She needed that money! And it was that thought only that was keeping her glued to the grey leather as the slow minutes passed. Pointless, she half accepted, and yet the deep, deep sense of outrage she felt still kept her there. She had sat for almost two hours before she finally accepted that she would have to throw in the towel this time around. Sinkingly resigned, Vicky knew that, stupid as she would look, she would just have to get to her feet and leave. With a sense of bitter resignation she folded up the last of the newspapers and replaced it on the table. She would just have to think of some other way of achieving her end. Quite what, though, she had no idea. A face-to-face confrontation with her husband had been her last resort. Her eyes flashed darkly. Not surprisingly, considering that Theo Theakis was the last person on earth she ever wanted to see again! Which was why, as she picked up her handbag from the floor and prepared to stand, bitter with defeat, her stomach suddenly plummeted right down to her heels. She could see him. Her eyes went to him immediately, drawn by that malign awareness that had been like doom over her ever since that first fateful encounter. Half a head taller than the other suits around him, he strode forward, his pace faster than theirs, more impatient, as they hurried to keep up. One of the group was talking to him, his expression concentrated, and Theo had his face half turned towards the man. Vicky felt herself go cold. Because she could feel it again—feel that tremor in her veins that Theo Theakis could always set running in her whenever she looked at him. It was as if she was mesmerised, like a rabbit seeing a fast car approaching and not being able to move, not being able to drag her eyes away. It was not just his height, or the breadth of his shoulders and the leanness of his hips. It was not the fact that he looked like a billion dollars in a charcoal handmade suit that must have cost thousands of pounds, with his dark, sable hair immaculately styled, or that his face seemed as if it was planed from a fine-grained stone that revealed every perfect honed contour. It was more than that—it was his eyes, his dark, fathomless eyes, that could look at her with such coldness, with such savage fury, and with another expression that she would not, would not, let herself remember. She saw him give a brief assenting nod, and look ahead again. And that was when he saw her. She could see it happening. See the precise moment when he registered her presence. See the initial flash of disbelief—followed by blinding fury. And then it was gone. As she was gone from his vision. Gone from the slightest claim on the smallest portion of his attention. He had simply blanked her out as if she did not exist. As if she had not been sitting there for nearly two whole hours, waiting. Waiting for him to descend to ground level, where the mortals dwelt in their lowly places, far, far from the exclusively rich, powerful people that made up his world. He was walking past her, still surrounded by his entourage. Any moment now he would be past the sofas and out of the sheer glass door, which one of the group was already hurrying to hold steady for his Generated by ABC Amber LIT Converter, http: Very soon he would be out of the building he owned, the company he owned, and away from the people he owned. She surged to her feet towards him. She saw his head turn, just by a fraction. But not towards her. He gave one of the suits flanking the outer edge of his entourage an almost imperceptible shake of his head. Vicky saw the man peel off from the group, cross behind it with a swiftness that was as soft-footed as it was unanticipated by her, and intercept and block her path exactly where she would have been level with her target.
