First week of May, I was finishing breakfast, sipping my coffee. The curtain was drawn to a view of the our mini-forest near the front door. Three Douglas firs, one blue spruce, three juniper bushes all with low hanging branches - the perfect environs for the black birds to make their nests and for the bunnies to live. Some birds bouncing around perhaps? Three of the them. What were they doing there? They had just slipped out of my mini-forest. I hollered to my dear husband. We watched them, wondering how they got there. The little ones looked lost. Two kittens stuck together and were off exploring the strange world out there. One was shy and lagged behind in the cover of the trees. Then the two brave ones wandered into the street. These kittens knew nothing about the perils of cars. The two made it across the road. It had little traffic since it was a dead end. I have seen hockey moms driving their SUVs while talking on cell phones imperilling the pesky mule deer sassily meandering into the road. Across the street, the kittens upset some of the birds, then they returned to their sibling and their familiar home in the bushes. We saw no momma cat around that day. Undoubtedly, the little ones were hungry and were looking for their next meal. So we left out some water and beat up an egg, setting the bowls near the bushes and low hanging branches. A brave one came out sniffing. Her other two litter mates got the idea. Later, that day we got them some wet cat food. They took an instant liking to it. We had them hooked - on the path from feral to domesticated. Their personalities were evident from the get go. The brave and most obnoxious one. The cautious and sweet one. This one was wary, more polite, and would allow us to handle her, but never imposed herself on you. This one did not like to be touched. When I did catch him, he growled and squirmed. But he came around - just out of reach - and joined his siblings in the eating and the sleeping. Though different, the three stuck together. As they napped, they all piled on each other for warmth as well as giving each other moral support in this big strange world. But we could not keep them. My dear husband is quite allergic to cats. None of our neighbors wanted them. The local shelter was full. What to do with three little kittens? The answer came in a flyer from a drug store. So we took care of the tiny fur balls for two and half weeks before the event. They got used to humans, hooked on Kitten Chow , and began to learn the concept of a litter box. The day came to roundup the kittens. They were all very quiet during our ride into town. They entered the queue of many other kitties waiting in their carriers to be fixed. We filled out much paperwork, left a donation, and left the kittens in the hands of cat rescue. The story had a happy ending. Cat rescue followed up with a phone call. They found the three little kittens a home. A lady, who had just lost her cat, took in all three. May they live long and be spoiled rotten! You made a difference in the lives of these little ones. I love these words from Francis of Assisi:
