Frequently Asked Questions Q1: Why is Harvard University making its library catalog metadata publicly available? Open access to data and metadata are cornerstone values of the Harvard Library. With growing interest in and benefits from integrating library information into the web, the time seems right to support innovation in this space with as much metadata as we can. Most libraries make their catalogs available online. How is this different? Library catalogs make use of metadata to allow for online searching of information about library collections, but catalogs generally do not make the metadata itself available for harvesting so that it can be reused in innovative ways. Library metadata is the foundational information such as author, title, publisher and subject about the books, journals, and many other forms of knowledge traditionally collected by libraries. These are important cultural objects, but without libraries making the information about them available in a reliable, reusable form, it has been hard for developers to create applications that make full use of them. Harvard hopes not only that the release of its catalog metadata will enrich the Web ecosystem, but also that more institutions will be encouraged to release their metadata. How many records will be available? How is Harvard making this metadata available? MARC21 is the standard format for encoding bibliographic information. An API application programming interface enables a computer program to request information from a site. So, if you want to write a program that, for example, retrieves information about books classified both in science and in cooking, your program could make that request via the API. The DPLA is an independent national organization, with a diverse steering committee and contributors from all across the nation. Is Harvard placing any restrictions on use of the data? No, Harvard is not imposing any limitations on use of the data. However, we are requesting that users comply with a simple set of Harvard Library community norms. These norms request attribution and that if others improve this data, they make those improvements equally freely available. We believe that observing these community norms will help promote good practices, foster trust among partners, and encourage growth of the open metadata community. CC0 is a public domain designation developed by the Creative Commons for use when a person wants to relinquish all copyright and related rights the person has in a work. More information about CC0 1. With the CC0 public domain designation, Harvard waives any copyright and related rights it holds in the metadata. We believe that this will help foster wide use and yield developments that will benefit the library community and the public. How big is the downloadable file? The initial set of MARC21 records consists of a single file of approximately 3. Is it possible to get selected subsets of records from the database? Only the full set is available as a downloadable file. Applications that incorporate the metadata, including the DPLA beta platform, can provide additional functionality. For example, if you have a site that lets people review textbooks, you might use the API to fetch the page count of a book as a user begins a review. Will the data be updated? Yes, Harvard Library plans to update the records in this dataset on a weekly basis. Have other libraries released records? For example, the British Library has released 3 million records , Cologne libraries have released 5. Although Harvard does not impose any legally binding conditions on access to the Metadata, Harvard requests that you act in accordance with the following Community Norms of the Harvard Library with respect to the Metadata: Second, Harvard requests that you make the Metadata and any improvements thereto freely available on the same terms as Harvard has done, i. Use of metadata from the WorldCat database for study and research is consistent with those norms, but if you plan to use such Metadata for other purposes, whether or not you are an OCLC member, we ask that you review and comply with those norms.
