We all know that cats are, by far, the best companions to have. Adrienne recently wrote a blog on 5 reasons why cats are better than dogs - and now I am here to give you 5 of the (many) reasons cats are better than men.

Telegram Whatsapp Reddit Mail Subscribe Stumbleupon Print This is a brief discussion on the subject that women are better at taking care of companion cats than men. In order to discuss it we need to look at one major difference between men and women: Women are better cat caretakers than men. Cat whisperer bottom left is Jan. The photo is by yi. Top two photos are bought from iStockphoto. They are individuals with their own special personalities. You could say that a sensitive male is better at cat caretaking than a female. I want to discuss the general view that women are better cat caretakers than men because they are more sensitive and intuitive. I think that is a key factor. A sensitive person is more alert and it is said that intuition makes people more sensitive. Also women are said to have more empathy and patience than men who tend to want to get their own way and achieve immediate results. Often a tender, slow process, which is in tune with nature, is much better when dealing with a cat. Men are more used to dictating opinion whereas women are more in tune with the idea of achieving a consensus amongst others to achieve a goal. Women are more in tune with how we say things to others to get a result. The tone and demeanor is more important to a woman. A man will tend to just say it and sod it. These are my conclusions: You cannot stereotype a woman and a man. It is too black-and-white. There are vast areas of grey in between the sexes. This alone could render meaningless the idea that women are better cat caretakers than men. Women are more consensus orientated, which might mean they are better cat owners. Women work more slowly or to put that in a more acceptable way: Women are more intuitive and sensitive. That is perhaps a stereotype that I have to question. Women are more in tune with cats solitary animals and men are more in tune with dogs pack animals.
