There are few reasons for that. First of all, CFA Level 1 is way too easy for people who are good in finance and have a background in economics and maths. You need to double your preparation time: And you need much more depth in comprehending the concepts than you did in CFA Level 1 exam. Often the vignettes are too direct and you need to answer only one thing without having any chance to elaborate. Know the weights of the subject according to item sets: But still you need to prioritize and give more weight to the subjects that will act mightier in the item set questions. So you need to know what to expect from which subjects. You may also need to go back and understand few concepts in CFA Level 1 exam. Give special attention on distribution of time: Vignette type questions take more time to answer than any multiple choice type questions. Thus, you need to practice a lot more before you ever get to answer everything in the examination hall perfectly. In the final section, we will talk about sample questions so that you can get an idea about what to expect in the question paper. But practicing sample questions are must, otherwise, it would be difficult for you to clear CFA Level 2 exam in one go. Should you read the Vignette first or read the questions first? Many candidates prefer to read the questions first so that they understand the kind of questions expected from the vignette numerical, conceptual, factual and then they read the case study. I have personally never tried this approach. My approach was straight forward, i used to read the vignette real quick and then the question. For answering the questions, anyways, you will have to refer back to vignettes time and again. As a strategy, i used to pick sections where I was strongest sections. Picking the strongest helps you build confidence during the exam and also help you save valuable time that can be used for attempting the weaker sections.
