February 10, by rontrembathiii Leave a comment Madison is the thirteen-year-old daughter of a narcissistic film star and a billionaire. Abandoned at her Swiss boarding school over Christmas, she dies over the holiday, presumably of a marijuana overdose. The last thing she remembers is getting into a town car and falling asleep. Madison soon finds that she shares a cell with a motley crew of young sinners: Together they form an odd coalition and march across the unspeakable landscape of Hell—full of used diapers, dandruff, WiFi blackout spots, evil historical figures, and one horrific call center—to confront the Devil himself. I must begin this piece by clearly stating this: There is absolutely so much to love about this book. It is clever, original, and absolutely brilliant. And though it may rank at the bottom of my favorites from Mr. Palahniuk, that is still sort of like being the least kind deed done by Gandhi or Dr. Martin Luther King among a plethora of amazing things done, right? But this is definitely not one of them. I find it sort of ironic that I managed to read a Hemingway and Palahniuk book, one after another, and found them both to be my least favorite of their works. In the simplest terms, and most convenient definitions get it? So, there I said it. I can now continue on bashing the work of a legend who I could never even dream of being compared to, what with my constant grammatical errors and studious love for ending sentences with prepositions. That being said, again, I must also admit that I have never read Fight Club. Paradise By the Dashboard Light himself. But, I simply have not gotten around to it. The man is a genius with them words, and is obviously one of the finest novelists of our time. Sure it is clever and littered with a wonderfully new concept of what hell must look like, involves a brilliant cohesion of John Hughes and Dante in one, and evokes the idea that all sugar laced treats belong in hell a theory in which I can jump on board with. There are so many beautiful things about this book, and as you would expect, it is highly controversial. But, my major complaint is that Mr. Palahniuk seemed to be more focused on the controversy he is known to provoke, rather than emphasizing on the brilliant writing he is also widely known for. I mean, this is the guy who once wrote a book about a former porn star who is beset upon the idea of setting the record for having the most dicks inserted in to her in one concurrent setting, and managed to make it a beautiful tale that was also sorrowful and almost tear jerking. Therefore, the concept of a thirteen year old girl being sent to hell and going on an adventure should have been easy, right? Specificity is his fucking gold mine. Bitchy old actresses and plane crashes being the norm in the literary world that is. Yet, he manages to put a science ficitony type twist to the end of all of these tales that is absolutely mind blowing. Maybe that is the problem here. The concept of living in hell is an open ended discussion that could go on for hours, which may have left our dear writer with far too much space to move around, when he is used to a more specific and cramped space to create. And perhaps this is a reasonable explanation as to why there is actually a sequel to this book already on the shelves entitled Doomed. I know that I will ultimately read this book as well despite my dissertation here about how I did not like this book. As I previously stated, there just may have been too much space for Chuck to move around with using such an age old concept as Hell. Therefore, a creative mind like Palahniuk could probably write more volumes about living in Hell than one person could enjoy in a lifetime. Shit, when I consider the fact that Hell is as real as a place as Narnia or The Place of Dead Roads, the possibilities actually seem endless. It is an empty canvas just waiting for Palahniuk to splash with paint made from the blood of the wicked. And I will continue to respect his decisions to follow this path. But, I might be waiting for him to move back to his old ways and means. We will be making a valiant effort to read and review at least books. This is review 3. Be sure to stay in touch and be on the lookout for further reviews throughout Be sure to let us know if we are falling behind.

About Chuck Palahniuk Chuck Palahniuk's novels are the bestselling Fight Club, which was made into a film by director David Fincher, Diary, Lullaby, Survivor, Haunted, and Invisible Monsters. Portions of Choke have appeared in Playboy, and Palahniuk's nonfiction work has been published by Gear, Black Book, The Stranger, and the Los Angeles Times.

Chuck Palahniuk September 28, Chuck Palahniuk pronounced pal-a-nuck gave a reading tonight at the Public Library. I had planned on showing up, finding my friends Liz and Steph, and settling in for a good reading by an author I really like. Well I showed up late. And there were a crapload more people than I had expected. I should take a few steps back. You may know Chuck Palahniuk best as the author of Fight Club. If you liked the style, I encourage you to pick up any of his other books I would recommend Survivor or Choke, and avoid Invisible Monsters. Great voice, great style, and reads like lightning. Upon arrival, everyone is handed a bookmark. There was also a number written on the bookmark, to indicate when you arrived. After the reading, people could line up for autographs based on that number. Having arrived too late for a seat in the main auditorium, I am directed to a smaller room a bit farther away, complete with a large monitor and two speakers. A big group of us end up watching the reading remotely. Instead, he read excerpts from a short story called Guts. Let me say this: I was incredibly affected physically by the sheer act of this man reading words out loud. The immediate experience I think of was when this girl Jenny read American Psycho to me. But even that easily pales in comparison to hearing Guts read out loud. I crossed my arms several times. I crossed my legs repeatedly. Other guys did the same. During the reading, several people simply got up and walked out. One person in our overflow room fainted. There were some rumors that the fainters were plants. But I must say "I was extremely uncomfortable at several turns. And I really believe people could have and did faint. He had a lot of great things to say, about his own writing and writing in general. He mentioned that, while writing his novels, he listened to the same album over and over again. I found this bit of trivia really encouraging, as I tend to do similar things with songs. On stage, he had with him a big cardboard box filled with fake, bloody appendages. He said that he had a ton of these things, and they were great fetch toys for his dog. He quickly stated that, soon after, the couple was laughing fit to burst. Instead of firing the gun, he asks what the clerk wants to do most in life" and vows to return in six months. I guess I really like these moments in his writing. He kept taking questions until the limbs ran out. So I mentioned that we all got bookmarks, right? Listing the order in which we arrived? I hung around after the reading, hoping for an autograph. My bookmark showed me as the st person to show up. For everyone who wanted something signed, a library worker wrote out your name on a post-it, and put it on the front of your book. The thing I brought him to sign? It was a copy of Story Magazine Spring, This was a small literary mag, specializing in short stories. I subscribed to it for a while, when I was a grad student, and first came across his work here. In this issue, there was a small excerpt from Fight Club, a chapter entitled Project Mayhem. This chapter was published prior to the novel, and a bit before the movie. While everyone else had copies of Choke or Diary, I was pretty excited to walk up with this.

His parents separated when he was 14 and subsequently divorced, often leaving him and his three siblings to live with their maternal grandparents at their cattle ranch in eastern Washington. He moved to Portland, Oregon soon after. He wrote for the local newspaper for a short while, and then began working for Freightliner as a diesel mechanic, continuing until his writing career took off. During that time, he wrote manuals on fixing trucks and had a stint as a journalist, a job to which he did not return until after he became a successful novelist. After casually attending a seminar held by an organization called Landmark Education, Palahniuk quit his job as a journalist in 1988. He ceased volunteering upon the death of a patient to whom he had grown attached. By his account, he started writing while attending workshops for writers that were hosted by Tom Spanbauer, which he attended to meet new friends. Fight Club [edit] When he attempted to publish his novel, Invisible Monsters, publishers rejected it. After initially publishing it as a short story which became chapter 6 of the novel in the compilation, Pursuit of Happiness, Palahniuk expanded it into a full novel, which, contrary to his expectations, the publisher was willing to publish. Initially, Palahniuk struggled to find a literary agent and went without one until after the publication of Fight Club. The film was a box office disappointment although it was 1 at the U. Three editions of the novel have been published in paperback, in 1999, in 2002 with a new introduction by the author about the success of the film adaptation, and in 2005 with an afterword by Palahniuk. He also confirmed that he is working on a series of original short stories for comics which will appear as one-shots before eventually being collected into a single book. A few years later Palahniuk managed to make his first New York Times bestseller, the novel Choke, which later was made into a movie. At that time, his father, Fred Palahniuk, had started dating a woman named Donna Fontaine, whom he had met through a personal ad under the title "Kismet". Her former boyfriend, Dale Shackelford, had previously been imprisoned for sexual abuse, and had vowed to kill Fontaine as soon as he was released from prison. In the spring of 1999, Shackelford was found guilty for two counts of murder in the first degree and sentenced to death. In the wake of these events, Palahniuk began working on the novel Lullaby. He has stated that he wrote the novel to help him cope with having participated in the decision to have Shackelford receive the death sentence. The story begins with the author telling his listeners to inhale deeply and that "this story should last about as long as you can hold your breath. On his tour to promote Stranger than Fiction: True Stories during the summer of 2000, he read "Guts" to audiences again, bringing the total number of fainters up to 53 and later up to 60 while on tour to promote the softcover edition of Diary. In the fall of that year, he began promoting Haunted, and continued to read "Guts". In June 2001, Palahniuk noted that his number of fainters was up to 73. Since then audio recordings of his readings of the story have been circulated on the Internet. In the afterword of the latest edition of "Haunted", Palahniuk reported that "Guts" had been responsible for 73 fainting events. At a appearance in Miami, Florida, during the Haunted tour, Palahniuk commented that Haunted represented the last of a "horror trilogy" including Lullaby and Diary. He also indicated that his then-forthcoming novel, Rant, would be the first of a "science fiction trilogy". In 2002, Palahniuk spent a week at the Clarion West Writers Workshop, instructing eighteen students about his writing methods and theory of fiction. The film rights to Survivor were sold in early 2002, but no movie studio had committed to filming the novel. After the attacks on the Pentagon and World Trade Center on September 11, 2001, movie studios apparently deemed the novel too controversial to film because it includes the hijacking and crashing of a civilian airplane. Palahniuk has said that the same people who made the film Constantine will be working on this film. While little is known about some of these projects, it is known that Jessica Biel was signed on to play the roles of both Shannon and Brandy in Invisible Monsters, which was supposed to begin filming in 2002, but as of [update] is still in development. Lullaby used a variation of this, alternating between the normal, linear narrative and the temporal end, after every few chapters. Exceptions to this narrative form, however, include the more linear Choke and Diary. Often a major plot twist exists that is revealed near the end of the book, which relates in some way to this temporal end what Palahniuk refers to as "the hidden gun". His more linear works also include similar plot twists. In an interview, he said that he "prefers to write in verbs instead of adjectives. When not writing fiction, Palahniuk tends to write short non-fiction works. Working as a freelance journalist, he writes essays and reports on a variety of subjects. He sometimes participates in the events about which he writes, which are heavy in field research. He also has written interviews with celebrities, namely, Juliette Lewis and Marilyn Manson. These works appear in various magazines and newspapers, such as the Los Angeles Times and Gear magazine. Some of these writings have shown up in his book, Stranger than Fiction: Palahniuk also includes some non-fiction factoids within his fictional works and according to the author, these are included in order to further immerse the reader in his work. The characters are people who have been marginalized in one way or another by society, and often react with self-destructive aggressiveness. He labels these stories as transgressional fiction. Beginning with Lullaby, the style of his novels changed to mostly satirical horror stories. These fights are a representation of the struggle of the proletariat at the hands of a higher capitalist power; by asserting himself as capable of having the same power he thus becomes his own master. Later when fight club is formed, the participants are all dressed and groomed similarly, allowing them to symbolically fight themselves at the club and gain the same power. He is a regular participant in their events, including the annual Santa Rampage a public Christmas party involving pranks and drunkenness in Portland, Oregon. His participation in the Society inspired some of the events in his writings, both fictional and non-fictional. Palahniuk was asked to help determine the sentence for the man who killed his father; he asked for the death penalty. Believing that he would be "outed" by Valby after confidentially referring to his male partner, he openly declared his homosexuality on his website. He told one interviewer, "We both had these very blue-collar lives, and now our lives are completely different.
