's - Rival institutions joke that Dartmouth is the only college among its peers that has a larger gymnasium than it does a library. However, by the end of the 's, with major gifts from two donors (George Baker and Edwin W. Sanborn), Dartmouth in has one of the best endowed and well- housed research libraries in the country.

Horrell - - Eleazar Wheelock brings his library to Hanover, mostly religious tracts, Bibles, and primers, approximately volumes he had assembled, or received as donations from supporters in England and Scotland, for his work in Moors Indian Charity School. It is not large, but there are some very good books in it. Use of the library restricted to officers and students of the College, and resident graduates. The availability of the collection is limited: Middle room of the first floor set aside for the Library - The collection numbers approximately 3, volumes, many of which are duplicates and of little practical use to the students and faculty. Library hours are very restricted: No one is permitted to take a book down from the shelves without permission of the librarian. Circulation is limited to one volume at a time for freshmen, two for sophomores and juniors, and three for seniors. In attempting to seize the books before they could be removed, officers and agents of the University break into the Society library and are set upon by a group of students defending their property. The University forces realize they are outnumbered and withdraw. Ultimately, both sides press charges, both students and University faculty are arrested, but an agreement is reached before the matter comes to trial. Rufus Choate is among the students involved in the "riot". Hubbard believes that giving free access to undergraduates is unworkable. This agreement remained in place until when the societies disbanded and full title to their libraries was transferred to the College. The shelving arrives barely in time for the Commencement opening. Sanborn , Dartmouth in has one of the best endowed and well- housed research libraries in the country. The collection numbers , volumes; the building will accommodate , volumes. The move from Wilson Hall, and from storage in the basement of New Hampshire Hall, is accomplished at the rate of 15, volumes per day. Their purpose is the acquisition of rare single volumes or collections, manuscripts, etc. Additional capacity is nearly , volumes - Library holdings stand at , volumes - East courtyard of Baker is filled in to house the bindery and cataloging depts. It is expanded in The Tenth Muse, by Anne Bradstreet. The northwest courtyard between Baker and Carpenter Hall is filled in for the art library, renamed the Sherman Art Library, and a workroom for Special Collections. It has taken the Library years to achieve its first million volumes, and a mere 24 years to double the collection.
