All Auctions are conducted in Pacific Standard Time. The mechanics are VG and everything works. The grips are in fine shape, and as you can see it is marked in many places. It appears that it may be missing one grip screw , yet the grips are on very tight. The reserve will be met as all these guns I have up are estate guns that must be sold. I have placed the reserve far lower than any I have seen sold elsewhere. Please look over the next 2 weeks as I will be listing almost daily until they are all gone. Here is some info I found on the web. See my other auctions. Japanese flare guns shingo-ju are quite scarce. Shown above are a an Army Type 10 single-barrel right , Navy Type 90 double-barrel model centre and a Navy Type 90 triple barrel right. Total production of all Army and Navy models combined was less than 30, units. They were also not as popular as souvenirs with US GIs as regular pistols, so few were brought back. Fortunately for collectors their prices do not fully reflect their scarcity since collecting flare pistols is not as popular as collecting regular pistols. I think they are really cool, though, and was pleased as punch to be able to obtain two of those shown above in December, when a US collection was liquidated. In April and July I was able to add two more. I also have holsters for the single and double barrel models, but am still looking for one for the triple barrel. The Imperial Japanese Army used almost exclusively the Type 10 shown above, which fired 35mm flares. The Imperial Japanese Navy used several models that had one, two or three barrels and discharged a 28mm flare. Of these Naval models, the double-barreled version of the Type 90 was by far the most common there were actually more double-barrel Navy flare guns made than the single-barrel Army Type The flares themselves are very scarce. Brown, now considers these as "Special Naval Pistols" intended primarily for guard use with 12 gauge shotgun shells, whereas in previous works they were lumped in with flare guns.
