It was alleged that he was responsible for the establishment of a covert network which subsequently funneled those funds to the Contras. Congress passed the Boland Amendment to the House Appropriations Bill of and following years , [19] which prohibited the appropriation of U. However, he gave the wrong number of the Swiss bank account intended to launder the money, and it went instead to a Swiss businessman. A Senate committee investigating the transaction tracked it down so it could be returned to Brunei. His family was moved to Camp Lejeune in North Carolina and lived with federal agents until North retired from the Marine Corps the following year. During the hearings, North admitted that he had lied to Congress, for which, along with other actions, he was later charged. He defended his actions by stating that he believed in the goal of aiding the Contras, whom he saw as freedom fighters against the Sandinistas and said that he viewed the Iran-Contra scheme as a "neat idea. He also testified that Robert McFarlane had asked him to alter official records to delete references to direct assistance to the Contras and that he had helped. He was indicted on 16 felony counts, and on May 4, , he was initially convicted of three: He was sentenced by U. North performed some of his community service within Potomac Gardens , a public housing project in southeast Washington, DC. After further hearings on the immunity issue, Judge Gesell dismissed all charges against North on September 16, North lost, garnering 43 percent of votes, while incumbent Democrat Charles Robb , [33] a son-in-law of President Lyndon B. Johnson , won reelection with 46 percent. Coleman received 11 percent. This was the biggest accumulation of direct-mail funds for a statewide campaign to that date, and it made North the top direct-mail political fundraiser in the country in In the book, "North addresses issues of defense against global terrorism, Jihad, and radical Islam from his firsthand perspective as a military officer and national security advisor and current Middle East war correspondent. This is a nonfiction book that gives a firsthand account of the Americans who have volunteered to join the United States Army. The book was a collection from the dozen years North and the Fox News Channel have traveled the frontlines of the War on Terror. During those years North and his team have profiled hundreds of soldiers and chronicles what it means to be a hero. In the book he continues the journey by following these soldiers from the battlefield back to the home front. North was the host of the television show War Stories with Oliver North from to , and is a regular commentator on Hannity , both on the Fox News Channel. North appears in an episode of Auction Kings to have his Marine Corps sword returned after it was lost and presumably stolen in North was credited as a military consultant in the video game Call of Duty: Black Ops II and voiced himself in one level of the game. In he received story credit for an episode of the TV series The Americans where the protagonist Soviet spies infiltrate a Contra training base in the United States. The charity has been criticized by conservative blogger Debbie Schlussel for distributing too little of its funds for charitable purposes.

The final troop list included elements of the U. It was the largest U. The brigade was ordered to Vietnam in early summer of and arrived there by sea and air in August. The area of operations assigned to the th was on the southern fringes of the Dong Minh Chau, or War Zone C, as it was popularly called. That area and War Zone D, just to the east and in the southern portion of Phuoc Long province, had been used by the Viet Minh as base areas during the French colonial days and continued to be used as supply, training and administrative zones for the Viet Cong VC during the years of U. The first, from September 14 to October 31, , was a series of probing maneuvers resulting in only light and sporadic contact with the VC, but huge amounts of rice and other stores were uncovered and captured. All three battalions of the th participated in one way or another. After light contact with the VC, the battalion returned to base camp on September. The battalion stayed on the operation until October 14, encountering a small number of VC and being credited with two VC kills. This phase of Operation Attleboro was controlled from the Tay Ninh base camp by the th commander, Brig. Phase II of Attleboro, still under command of the commanding general of the th, began November 1 and ended November 5. On November 3 a scheme of maneuver was worked out by the th staff to utilize and coordinate actions of all three committed infantry battalions. Meloy violently objected to the battle plan. He felt that, although it may have looked impressive on the map and seemed logical in briefings, the plan did not take into account the realities of infantry movement in dense, overgrown jungle and the extreme difficulty of maintaining control of many small, separated maneuver elements in that environment. As it transpired, the next three days exposed the flaws of the battle plan. Battalions were split by four to five kilometers; companies were lost; communications between battalion headquarters and brigade staff were nonexistent during critical times; and in the final phase of the battle, one battalion commander was commanding 11 infantry companies while another battalion commander was left to command only his headquarters elements. Because of the extremely difficult terrain in which the units were working, the attacking units were not mutually supporting. The company commander, Captain Frederick H. Henderson, sent a point patrol to the northeast into the woods to find the trail on which they were supposed to guide. The Battle of Dau Tieng. That initial encounter was the start of heavy, close-in fighting, which was typical during the rest of Attleboro. By the company had sustained six killed in action and six wounded. One of the casualties was Captain Henderson. Powers, the 2nd platoon leader, became company commander. Around Major Meloy, who had been overhead in his command helicopter, came in low on the LZ and jumped from the chopper when it was 5 feet off the ground. He then moved up to the wounded Captain Henderson. The VC had the advantage of firing from well-prepared positions along firing lanes that were close to the ground, well-concealed and hard to spot. They had also placed snipers high in the trees, tied to the trunks either to keep them from leaving their firing position or to prevent them from falling out of the trees if they were hit. Tree snipers were to cause their fair share of U. With Major Meloy on the ground taking personal control of the fighting and Captain Henderson critically wounded, the buildup of troops in the area continued. Captain Henderson died after the helicopter that had been summoned to lift him out was shot down trying to land on the LZ. Garrett, had already landed at on an LZ some four kilometers to the east of the rest of battalion and was heading northwest toward the blocking position established in the operations order. Evacuation of the dead and wounded began at sunset and lasted into the night. There were minor probes by the VC that night but no significant ground attacks. Late that evening, the th operations S-3 section published orders for the next day. The purpose of the plan was to prevent the 9th VC Division from moving to the southwest and to consolidate control of all subordinate commands of the th LIB. Although it was clearly important to consolidate the command, the new plan perpetuated the obvious mistakes of the original plan by moving individual, company-size units cross-country through terrain that made it next to impossible to maneuver and maintain control. They encountered no opposition. In order for the Americans to break through the enemy defensive position, the VC right flank had to be rolled up. Captain DeVries later explained that the 2nd platoon leader had simply misunderstood a command given over the radio. The unit fought with distinction. Sergeant Lester Armstrong, of Molden, Mo. At this point there was no radio communication with the headquarters. In his book Ambush, S. Although he was in pain, he refused evacuation; he also refused medication because he was worried that a pain reliever might affect his ability to think clearly. The company immediately moved east in an attempt to roll up the VC right flank. The battalion commander, Colonel Barrott, accompanied C Company. It took C Company and the battalion command group two hours of walking through the dense underbrush of the hardwood forest to reach a spot less than two kilometers away, where they thought they were on the flank of the VC. In fact, they were to the rear of the VC dug-in defensive positions. This was the first of three such assaults, which diminished in size and intensity. The third and weakest frontal assault was made by the VC at At that moment, Major Meloy had control of seven rifle companies in the immediate vicinity. By November 5, Major Meloy eventually would control the movements of 11 infantry companies. It was an obvious violation of the principle of span of control, and the commanders on the ground were concerned that the situation was out of control. Under the command of the ranking platoon leader, the company assaulted the VC position, but was unsuccessful. The VC had numerous automatic weapons and camouflaged fields of fire. At that point Barrott threw a smoke grenade to mark his location for the aircraft overhead. An FAC saw the smoke and took a reading. Barrott crossed a well-concealed lane of fire and was instantly killed by automatic weapons fire. The company first sergeant, a platoon leader, a platoon sergeant and several radio operators were also killed during this firefight. Higher headquarters had begun working on a new tactical plan to re-establish control over the rifle companies that had lost their way while maneuvering in the dense jungle. The priority from now on would be to consolidate and regain control over the fighting elements. The latest plan would eliminate separate companies moving through the thick underbrush, trying to reach ill-defined objectives, piecemeal deployment of maneuver units, and the unmanageable span of control that had been given to Major Meloy. The regrouping of forces and the final attack of this phase of Attleboro was to be under the command of the commanding general of the 1st Division, Maj. During the early hours of November 5, evacuation of the wounded was given priority. As daylight came, the firefight resumed. After moving 30 meters, the lead elements came under heavy fire and suffered eight casualties. The company laid down a base of fire and overran three bunkers, but could not breach the VC position. It was one of the most intense firefights during Attleboro. This gave Meloy command of 11 rifle companies. At , Major Henry R. This plan would gradually relieve Major Meloy of his unprecedented span of control. Given this situation, there could be no direct fire support. The fighting to the east broke out again. This was part of a new plan devised by the commanding general of the 1st Division. All forces were to be disengaged and withdrawn, and intensive artillery fire and air bombardment were then to be placed on the VC positions for the next 24 hours. The battalion would hold that objective and evacuate the casualties that had been left in place overnight. One of the bodies yet to be recovered from within the VC defensive position was that of Colonel Barrott. The attack was preceded by one of the heaviest concentrated artillery and air bombardments of the war to date. It would have been a miracle if anything or anyone had survived that much punishment. To evacuate the dead and wounded, B and C companies were each given about a dozen medical field stretchers. To his surprise, he discovered that the VC position was strung out laterally for about meters and had very little depth to it. This was the last major combat action for the th during Attleboro. II Field Force Vietnam took control of the operation on November 6, , and declared an end of the operation on November 24, Operation Attleboro exposed the lack of clear understanding by some senior commanders of how to best use American troops to fight an elusive and determined guerrilla force in the jungle. Complicated maneuvers by company-size units in the heavy underbrush of the jungle were not successful. Radio and ground communications between commanders were neither well planned nor properly tested. Piecemeal commitments of forces were made seemingly without rhyme or reason. The principle of span of control was violated by giving one battalion commander command over a brigade-size force of 11 rifle companies on an ad hoc basis. And finally, the American units lacked adequate, timely intelligence on the VC and NVA units in the area of operation. In spite of these tactical weaknesses, Operation Attleboro and its follow-on operations, Cedar Falls and Junction City, dealt the VC and North Vietnamese Army a blow from which they would not fully recover until the Tet Offensive. What began as a th LIB combat warm-up exercise ended in a massive corps engagement, supported by 22, troops, 12, tons of tactical air support, 35, artillery rounds and 11 B strikes. The VC left 1, dead on the battlefield and had 44 captured. Friendly losses were killed and wounded. This article was written by Colonel Charles K. Chapter 3 : Revisiting Phish's Baker's Dozen - Relix Media

A Baker's dozen is made up of 13 Baked goods. Not Rules: Do not act like an idiot. Breaking server rules, shooting allies and getting yourself killed in a foolish manner are all acts of idiocy.

Nothing is better, nothing is best Take heed of this, get plenty of rest. Bob Dylan said that back when he was hanging out in a basement with some guys who were once called the Hawks but were eventually The Band. On paper and on tape this could be the best show of the run. But then again, the same could be said about night 1 or 2 or 3 or It all depends on your perspective. But this was my very first Phish show, so if you ask me, this was, without question, the best show of the run, maybe the best show ever by anyone. But my hours poring over the Phish Companion, watching dozens of live streams, and listening to hundreds of shows proved to be ill preparation for my first real live encounter with the Phish from Vermont. For it to be my first show? To open a show with a complicated piece like "The Curtain With" is a statement unto itself. To mix a metaphor or three, if "The Curtain" is the cake or donut , then the "With" is the icing. To follow it up immediately with "Runaway Jim"? Speaking of donuts, mine had a TON of Jimmies on it. I mean, so many that surface of the donut itself was entirely obscured by Jimmies And this is still my first Phish show and the rest of the set is yet to come, and when it does, whoo-weee! And there was this whole "name game" component to the first set. In addition to a car-driving dog named Jim and Esther and the good Colonel and the monarch named Wilson and the walrus named Jimmy and Nellie Kane and Brian and Robert they were all there And then there was the second set. Writing about music, something something, dancing about architecture, right? Group improvisation at its finest, the band relaxing and letting the music take control. Oom-pa-pa, oom-pa-pa, oom-pa-pa, oom-pa-pa. This was my first show. To get it at my first show? Speaking of cosmic gravy, was just that, groovy cosmic dance party gravy. And Zarathustra is a name, so the name game is still going on And it was great. It was Golgi and it rocked. And "In the Good Old Summertime" was a nice touch, something to bring us back to earth. Oh, and lest we forget So to wrap it all up, one more name was called, or cried, as it were.. It was short and sweet and not at all jammed out. Just a reverent reading of the best song ever. So we wandered out into the New York City night. Me, I was a changed man, a different person than the guy who walked into the building. We greeted one another exchanged hugs and talked very briefly about the show. I went on my way, incapable of carrying on anything that remotely resembled a normal conversation. My Phish cherry was popped, but it was more complicated than that.

Build Foundations from Ace to King in each suit. Build Fans down in the same suit. Fans may hold any number of cards. Only one card may be moved at a time. Empty Fans must remain empty. Two redeals are allowed. Cards are shuffled before being redealt. On the third deal, one open Fan may be used as a Free Move. La Belle Lucie Solitaire allows three shuffles and has many opportunities to make skillful decisions. Goal Move all cards to the four Foundation piles from Ace to King in the same suit. The Deal Using one deck, all cards are dealt face up in Fans horizontal Columns of 3 cards each. The last Fan will hold the leftover single card. The same holds true for the other suits. Only the topmost card may be moved at a time. Once a Fan is empty, it must remain empty. Redeals The cards in the Fans may be gathered and Redealt at any time. The cards are shuffled before being redealt. Only two redeals are allowed. Free Move After the last deal, one extra space is provided that can start one extra fan. Any available card may be placed in this fan and then other cards may be played on top of the first card. Once this pile becomes empty it must remain empty. La Belle Lucie Strategy Since all cards are visible at the start of the hand, it will help you solve more games by studying the layout for a while before making your first play. There is never a reason to hold back any cards that can be moved to a Foundation. Play them as soon as you can. When a Fan has only one card in it, it is always safe to play onto that card. When a Fan contains two or more sequential cards of the same suit, it is likewise safe to play even more sequential cards onto those cards. They could be an exception to this rule on the third deal if the Free Move is still available. On the first two shuffles, since Kings cannot be moved except to a Foundation, review where the Kings are after each shuffle. Also, it is almost always acceptable to play onto a King even if the King is blocking other cards the exception being on the third deal when the Free Move is still in play. Since Kings likely cannot be moved early in the game, work on moving Queens onto the Kings. Then work Jacks onto the Queens, etc. Take notice of higher-ranked cards blocking lower-ranked cards of the same suit. Although it may not be possible to move these cards to Foundations directly, sometimes they can be unstacked by moving the higher-ranked card to another Fan. Once you place a card onto another card, neither card can be moved or any cards blocked by them until those cards are played to a Foundation except for the Free Move. So generally, you will want to focus on the higher-ranked cards first. So before moving a card, consider if the card that you are moving onto can be moved first. It is easy to see a possible way to play cards to Foundations, but then block those plays too. Once a Fan is empty it cannot be repopulated. So there is no need to quickly move the last card in a Fan unless it is to a Foundation. On the third and last shuffle you will most likely need to move a King into the Free Move spot. If there are two or more Kings blocking other cards, move the King to the Free Move spot that is likely to be one of the last Kings that would get moved to Foundations. Occasionally, it may make more sense to use the Free Move for a lower-ranked card. It is very difficult to win until the third shuffle.
