Massachusetts Census Division Decennial census printed returns and summaries, Prior to , censuses in Massachusetts were generally limited to the U. Each state census, with a few exceptions, was authorized by an enabling act that further defined its scope. Censuses were supervised by the state secretary, who was responsible for providing city and town officials with blank forms, for collecting returns, and for tabulating results. Enumeration itself was carried out by city and town officials. Const Amend Art 13 changed the basis of representation from ratable polls to inhabitants and provided for state decennial censuses beginning in St , c mandated a decennial census at mid-decade, beginning in , which had the effect of providing for a state census every five years. St , c 60, however, abolished the end-of-decade census, taken in and , which had coincided with the federal one. The scope of the census was changed to include an enumeration of legal voters to serve as the basis for determining representation, along with the census of inhabitants Const Amend Arts Decennial censuses of legal voters were used for determining legislative apportionment until , when Const Amend Art 92 once again established a decennial census of inhabitants as the basis for representation. The agency was renamed the Bureau of Statistics in St , c , s 25 returned sole responsibility for the decennial census to the state secretary and authorized him to appoint a supervisor of the decennial census who would be responsible for collecting, compiling, and publishing census information. Responsibility for industrial statistics was given to the successor to the Bureau of Statistics, the Division of Statistics in the new Dept. St , c redesignated the supervisor as state census director. St , c gave the secretary the authority to verify census information returned by the cities and towns and to make inspections of records if necessary. Under constitutional and statutory provisions in effect through , the state decennial census of inhabitants was conducted for the purpose of determining representative, senatorial, and councillor districts and as a basis for distributing state funds to cities and towns Const Amend Art , as amended by Amend Art In the state secretary for the first time exercised his statutory power by challenging returns from the City of Boston in the decennial census. The governor established a Decennial Census Commission to investigate. This action was ratified by the electorate in Nov.
