comporting roadwise: This wonderful memoir of life on the road, Rainbow Gatherings, hippie enclaves, and struggle against conformity was gestated in Venice. RomTom had been writing it for years, but it was only after a series of meetings with publisher Marc Madow, in and '92, that the project really took off.

After about a month the camper shell was taken off the truck and placed in the yard next to their house. A couple weeks ago a big funky old bus that says Whale Museum showed up in front of the place and has been parked there ever since. Ghost Town - summer On the boardwalk a new to me anyway group showed up called Ecolibrium Alliance, whose home ground is Big Sur or somewhere equally remote. They travel with several animals in a large bus trimmed with purple and they all wear purple. Their weird medieval-looking odd-shaped handmade instruments were laid out on a carpet spread on the pavement. A banner said "Ecolibrium Survival Show. Their music was eerie and strange. Call Someplace Paradise - fall Tara suggested a mechanic named Jack, so I went over to his place of business on 3rd Avenue between Rose and Sunset. All along that block a caravan of strange vehicles park, and I think people live in them. An Anaheim school bus with non-matching curtains on all the windows. A flatbed truck with a plywood structure mounted on it. A van where I glimpsed a woman in white thermal longjohns moving something inside. Ghost Town - winter At the Safeway there has been a camper truck in the parking lot for a couple of weeks. It has a platform on the back. A refrigerator and a bag of golf clubs are on the platform with For Sale signs on them. A middle-aged woman came out, did something up front of the truck, then went back in. Apparently this is her home. Also in the lot there was another camper, the type with a sleeper over the cab, and lights were on inside it. Call Someplace Paradise - fall On the way home I saw a school bus in the parking lot of one of the local light industries. The body was still yellow, with "Heavy Metal" painted on the side in silver, and flowered curtains in all the windows. They interviewed a couple named Jim and Lisa who live in the Rose Avenue parking lot. They take cold water showers and someone stole their car radio. Every morning when I go by the Safeway back parking lot there are half a dozen people waiting by the dumpster for the spoiled food to come out. Call Someplace Paradise - spring At the Rose Avenue parking lot there are twenty vans, buses, trucks and campers which are residences. One of them has a wheelchair parked outside it. About the same number of cars probably have people living in them, or else what are they doing here at 6: The decorative pilings are very tall now, since the sand has shifted drastically on that part of the beach. Ten or so sleeping bags full of people are clustered around them, and another group of at least that many sleep farther along by one of the concrete ramps. Call Someplace Paradise - spring At the beach this morning, the Whale Museum bus was just pulling into the Rose Avenue parking lot, which looks more than ever like a village. Call Someplace Paradise - summer This morning there were almost no vehicles in the Rose Avenue parking lot. Seasonal departure, or LAPD cataclysm? What kind of people end up living in a parking lot on the Pacific? I once put a cast on the arm of a heavysset, red-haired woman who came here from Brooklyn with her husband and two kids. Everything they owned was in their car. Both the adults had jobs lined up, and a babysitter, then the real tenants of the apartment showed up. They spent one night sleeping out on the beach and another in the car. On the way to an interview for an apartment manager job, the brakes failed and they hit another car that belonged to "a working guy who saved so long for that car," the red-haired woman said. A dog sits next to its open door. Ghost Town - fall On the other side of Electric Avenue, on a weedy patch of vacant land, a truck was parked with a big home-made structure built into it. I pondered those inscriptions for a moment, then noticed in the back window ledge of a nearby parked car a book whose title was eerily appropriate: Call Someplace Paradise - fall On Rose Avenue a green bus was parked - the Green Tortoise Line, which is the outfit our neighbor the videographer made a documentary about. The destination on the side of the bus said Shreveport and the one on the top front said Paris. A motto painted in flowing script: Fire trucks were there and an astonishingly huge crowd, with more people arriving from all directions every minute. Ghost Town - summer

Chapter 3 : Comporting Roadwise : Romtom :

Get this from a library! Comporting roadwise: an autobiographical work. [RomTom.; Medicine Bow Gallery (Lake Oswego, Or.)] -- Autobiographical work detailing the story of RomTom, an American hippie-gypsy who lives as an American nomad.

But what they found was acres of tangled, bug-infested, logged out swampland, a wall of local hostility, and a climate so harsh and unforgiving that it brought tears to the eyes of the weak when the bitter winds of winter howled down across the Canadian border. Some took one look, hitched up their backpacks, and headed out without ever unrolling their sleeping bags. Others stayed, much to the dismay of the hard-working, French-Canadian locals who had viewed the invasion of their land by hordes of long-haired hippie freaks with fear and loathing. For a year, my family called EPP home. The hot issue that year was the threatened hippie invasion. Playboy magazine started it off with an article explaining how easy it would be for counterculture remember THAT word? A lot of people found that prospect terrifying. The Vermont media which was much more conservative in those days picked up the banner, warning that as many as half a million long-haired freaks might flock to the Green Mountains that summer. The concept was simple: The best way to keep the Woodstock Nation alive was to buy a piece of land somewhere and open it up to all the people. Led by the Hog Farm commune, which helped organize Woodstock, bands of disciples streamed across the nation, panhandling on street corners and passing the hat at rock concerts and college campuses. When enough cash had been raised, legend has it, the new nonprofit corporation bought the Norton property sight unseen out of a real estate catalogue. Because it was big. And it was cheap. The first settlers began arriving without much fanfare in the late summer and fall of A few actually stayed through the winter. On the first weekend of May, a colleague who wrote for The Burlington Free Press and I decided it was time to see for ourselves what all the fuss was about. I had an old, small school bus that had been converted to a camper, and we packed it up and headed to Norton. My friend and I spent the weekend at the park. We toured the land and met the people and lived the life. And a spark was lit inside me. My hair was down over my shoulders and my beard hit the middle of my chest. I was going through something of a philosophical and political upheaval as well, and EPP appealed to the latent anarchist that was growing inside my gut. Every weekend, we loaded the kids into the bus and headed to Norton. I went anyway, on my own time. It was a heck of a party. The problem was, I forgot to come back to work on Monday. To be sure, some people lived communally, sharing food, living quarters, resources. Others lived more solitary lives, guarding both their property and their privacy with pitbull tenacity. There were the young and the not-so-young, male and female, black and white; the fugitive and the seeker, the idealist and the cynic, the lawless and the godly. Some hoped that by freeing themselves from their urban ways and material possessions, they might carve a new way of life and a new way of living from the land. There were druggies and drunks, hoping that a fresh start in a new place might help them break the chains of their addictions. There were runaways hiding from their parents, and Jesus freaks who freely gave away all their worldly possessions. There were peaceniks and pacifists, Buddhists and bikers. There was a young man who walked around buck naked all the time, and a middle-aged engineer from Canada who built a sophisticated homestead and knew a little bit about everything. There were permanent settlers who built sturdy log homes and A-frames from scavenged lumber and dreamed of someday having a community school. They freeloaded off the residents and caused problems for the locals, then fled as soon as the frost began making threatening gestures toward the pumpkin. The land, after all, was pretty much the only thing we had in common. You arrived, staked out a piece of land, built or camped on it, and it was yours as long as you stayed. And no one had locks on their doors. The land would be open and free to all people. We took that very seriously. Moving on A kind of basic, primitive anarchy reigned at EPP. There was no electricity, no running water, no plumbing, no telephones, no television. In the wintertime, the rough and rocky path that served as a road was closed by snow, and a trip to the Norton store meant a three-mile trek. Few of the full-time residents had cars. We were older and more settled than most residents, and blessed with a few more creature comforts. During the summers, the park filled with transients who partied all night and generally upset the backwoods tranquility. But they were gone by fall, and only the most serious, diehard homesteaders stuck around after the snow began flying. Those winters were magical, joyful, vintage times. Playing charades by oil lamp and sipping hot apple cider with the family up the road, the air so cold and brittle it would shatter it like a pane of glass, and a full moon casting a blue-white radiance on a foot of fresh snow. No visitors could visit, no phone could ring.

Videotaco People live in their vehicles for a variety of reasons. American cities are passing laws which are essentially criminalizing both poverty and homelessness. Rubber Tramps shows both the romantic and difficult aspects of living on the road and is explained throughout by the commentary provided by author Ken Kesey. This film review by Alan Ruskin originally appeared on Earthblog. The original article by can be seen at; www.while.com. While rubber may be apropos, "tramps" seems somewhat inaccurate as a generic term for these folks, many of whom seem more advanced and "together" than your typical sedentary dweller. Most main-streamers not-in-the-know might choose to write off these freedom-seekers as an undesirable sub-culture on the fringes of society, the only environment that will harbor them, outcasts and weirdoes that they are. But not after "Rubber Tramps," no sir, not after viewing this quixotic and quietly penetrating film that succeeds in arousing sentiments in us that we might not have expected, feelings of admiration, respect, marvel and yes, even flashes of heart-rending, green-as-grass envy. In his final media appearance, Kesey greets us from atop a tractor while expounding upon what it means to be truly alive. We see the "Bicycle Bus" of RomTom which means "Gypsy Tom" , the itinerant artist, photographer, writer and activist who earlier in his colorful life was jailed and savagely persecuted for his anti-war stance in the Viet Nam War era. He also has many beautiful and wondrous photographs to display, visionary testaments to the legacy of the Rainbow People, a loosely knitted confederation of freedom-lovers that embodies the hippy ethic of the late 60s and early 70s, and still gathers to celebrate their spirit-driven counter-culture life-style. RomTom, as much as anyone in this film, makes us yearn for those magical days gone by. Another legendary vehicle that we are privileged to glimpse is the "Further" bus immortalized by Kesey and his Merry Pranksters. In fascinating, grainy home-movie clips we see hippy luminary Neal Cassady at the wheel of the bus while spouting his own brand of wisdom - Kesey says of Cassady, "He believed that you had to be out there ahead, pushing yourself. He used the bus and cars as a visual aid, not just a means of transportation. The vehicle is an extension of our personalities and our dreams. Another touching vignette focuses on a combat veteran, damaged both physically and emotionally from his stint in Viet Nam, who nonetheless struggles to raise his young son while maintaining the on-the-road life style for both of them. The traveler Freedom reappears from time to time, always sharing some thoughtful observation. In explaining the origin of his name, he espouses a view that might epitomize the belief of most of these folks, as well as appeal to many of the rest of us: Sometimes apprehension about the future might intrude and I might feel concerned about being abandoned by friends and family because of my chosen way of living. But I get over it quickly when I realize how rich the moment is with opportunity. As Kesey harks back to his halcyon days, "We were trying to reclaim our lives to be in the present, not the past or the future like society tells us to be - but instead to be in a state of grace, exulting in a feeling of beingness, with nothing else to achieve except to be present and involved with life.

For some, travel is not an occasional luxury, or even a periodic obligation, but a way of life. America has its share of eternally restless wanderers who make their homes in old buses, vans, and even cars. Sooner or later, most of them pass through Venice, California. This piece looks at a few of them , who were featured in Rubber Tramps, a documentary directed by Max Koetter and produced by Kenny Rosen. The film crew started in Venice and worked its way up the California coastline to Oregon, interviewing and immortalizing a fascinating array of road folks such as these: RomTom has spent plenty of time in Venice during his travels, and wrote a good portion of his book Comporting Roadwise in a local cafe. The film is stitched together with segments of a Ken Kesey interview, as the grand old man tromps around his Oregon farm. The ability to be at home anywhere is, nowadays, an extreme life skill. But it used to be the only game in town, back when there was no town. Our roaming hunter-gatherer ancestors knew how to make the whole world their comfort zone. The Romany people have been persecuted for centuries, forced into urban ghettos to put an end to their roving, and then persecuted some more. In the Czech Republic alone, there have been at least 35 racially motivated murders of Gypsies in the past 20 years. In The Star, Rosie Dimanno, who writes prolifically about the world political scene, provides a summary of the current situation. They camped someplace, and there were no problems. Then, the public health officials got involved, because to cook out in the open is unsanitary. Then they camped somewhere else! Well, the young man died. Not even a third of it. So they hit up the Prague city fathers and the Romanian embassy, which said it would let them know in a couple of weeks. At another campground, the city declined to provide the Gypsies with portable toilets or tanks of drinking water. They might like it too much and decide to stay. But in some other back yard.
