The book divides living space into functional areas and suggests ways to organize them conveniently, safely and attractively. Those of us who live in small spaces don't have a room devoted to all of the uses, but the organization suggestions for each area are extremely practical.

Two different sized mirrors enhance room size. No clutter is always great decor. Such strategies can transform an area that feels cramped and claustrophobic into one that feels cozy and aesthetically pleasing. Decorate in a way that maximizes light and space, and pay attention to how you use color, scale and weight. It can make quite a difference. Instead of using blinds for window treatments, use long, flowing drapes because they draw attention to vertical space, thus expanding the area of the room. Your living room, regardless of size, should be able to function as a space for relaxation and entertaining. Here are some of our favorite ways to make it feel more spacious. Collect this idea Decorate with Mirrors Designers often place mirrors strategically in small places in order to make them feel larger. One of the most common small living room ideas is to hang a large mirror in a central location to create a focal point. To reflect light and add a nice ambiance, put it behind a light source such as a candle or pendant lamp. If possible, position a mirror across from your window so it will reflect the view and give the illusion of another window. Collect this idea Draw the Eye Upward A room has a vertical dimension as well as a horizontal one. If your living room has a high ceiling, make the most of the extra space by decorating it in a manner that draws the eye upward. Floor-to-ceiling drapes are a stylish way to accomplish this goal. Another idea is to fill the vertical space with a menagerie of small to midsize artwork. This technique will make the room feel larger than it actually is, because it invites the eye to roam beyond the eye-level horizontal space that may feel confined. Collect this idea Use Neutral Colors for a Small Living Room One of the most popular small living room ideas is the use of neutral colors on walls, floor, ceiling and furniture upholstery. Soft hues also tend to illuminate a room by reflecting light. Collect this idea Choose Furniture with a Lightweight Appearance When you shop for furniture, consider its visual weight. This concept refers to the perceived heaviness of an object based on size, color and design. Pick out pieces that have a lightweight appearance, as heavier ones will seem to constrict a space. Opt for pale colors over darker ones, and select pieces that have legs while avoiding those that are boxy. A sofa with thin arms and a tightly upholstered back is preferable to one with substantial arms and a multi-cushion back. If space is tight, you could do without a couch completely, either choosing a loveseat or opting to position four chairs around a coffee table. When picking out chairs, consider armless ones because they will take up less space than a model with arms.

Chapter 2 : 29 Sneaky DIY Small Space Storage and Organization Ideas (on a budget!)

But living in a small space often comes out of necessity, rather than choice (as was my own case), and it can be a difficult transition from living with an excess of space to a lifestyle dictated by compromise, planning and just plain doing with less.

Collect this idea The pros weigh in on how they handle small space living. With a little planning and forethought, even the most cramped spaces can become equal parts functional and eye-catching. We asked some interior design pros to share their best tips for designing small spaces. Keep reading to see what they had to say. Plan your space carefully before you start buying. Ask yourself questions about how you use the room. For example, do you need storage for kids toys? Is a sectional a necessity or will a sofa and a chair be fine? Would a round table be a better fit for your dining area? Go big with a statement piece. However, if your home relies on recessed can lighting for most of its illumination, be sure to layer in some floor or table lamps so that you have light casting up onto your ceiling, too. Consider using a warm and rich or soft and soothing hue to cover the majority of the room, including the ceiling. Highlighting one unifying color fades defining lines, which enhances the coziness of the space. If space is an issue, think about investing in multi-functional furniture like a set of nesting tables that can double as a coffee table. A desk can also function as a buffet when entertaining, or even a bench can be a coffee table, extra seating. Day True Most of us would agree that small space living requires a certain amount of flexibility and creativity. To help you get the most out of your space, we asked interior design pros to share their best advice for helping compact rooms shine. Read over their tips and do your best to incorporate them in your own interiors. Sometimes one tip makes all the difference. Do you live in a small space? If so, what tips do you have for making limited square footage work in your favor? Share them with us in the comments below.

Oddly, these homes are often occupied by small families, spreading everyone out into different rooms, limiting interaction. Even in older neighborhoods, especially in larger cities such as Austin and Atlanta, smaller homes have been torn down, wanted only for the lot they sit on. In their place, gigantic structures are erected. While the McMansion boom of the last decade appears, for the most part, to be waning, the result is that there are now millions of families living in these large, palatial homes, which often come with enormous mortgages to match. However, since the recession hit, more people are realizing that small is beautiful. With energy bills and living costs constantly rising, living small also means living affordably. And for many, this is the most appealing aspect of living in a smaller home. Census , the average size of an American home was square feet in , and 1, square feet in In , the average had climbed to almost 2, But in spite of the dominance of large homes, more homeowners are remembering the many advantages to living in a small one. Less Cleaning and Maintenance Required. Fewer rooms means less time spent on cleaning and home maintenance. This has been a huge perk for my family, since it means we spend more time outdoors, doing things we love. Unlike the often gigantic rooms of a McMansion, small homes have small rooms. This gives each room, as well as the entire house, a feeling of coziness and intimacy that larger homes lack. Smaller homes are less expensive to live in. Most small homes built before the s were designed to stay cool using shade and cross-ventilation. During the summer months we live on the front porch, keep the windows open day and night, and use fans. Furthermore, the houses are set far back from the street, which means it would be harder to get to know the neighbors. Few, if any, have front porches big enough to sit and visit on. And none of them are within walking distance to town; we would have had to drive everywhere we wanted to go. Real Stories My own home is half the current U. This is why I love small-home living. They purposely sought out a smaller home so they could enjoy the benefits of being in town, even though it meant they would get less house for their money. Ask Strayer what she loves about living in a small home, though, and she runs through the gamut of benefits. I love that we can save money and live more effectively. Their income was a factor in choosing a smaller home, especially since they wanted to live in such an expensive area. Weaver has done a lot to the home to open up the space and brighten it up to make it look bigger. For instance, the living room was incredibly dark when they moved in, and the space was dominated by a black cast-iron wood stove. Weaver transformed the space by removing the stove and adding light wood paneling. He also created a built-in end table to save some space. The lack of privacy and the lack of space are two issues he and his wife grapple with daily. I know it sounds odd having sung the praises of smaller homes, but a wee bit more space would be nice. If we had one more room, that would allow for someone to escape to it and that would be beneficial for all. Strategies for Small Home Living In my own home, the rule is that whenever we bring something new in, something of equal size must be donated. As a result, our home feels open and uncluttered, which is key to living comfortably. But this mindset definitely is helped by planning and good habits: To curb the impulse to buy, cut down on watching TV. The less TV you watch, the less ads you see, which means the less pressure you feel to go out and buy new things all the time. If you bring something new into the house, something of equal size should go. I keep a bin in the downstairs closet to make adding to the donation pile quick and easy. Figure out what works best for your lifestyle and space, and set it up. Make Use of All Free Space. Use furniture that has closed storage built in. Nothing makes a small house look smaller than clutter. If you can keep it organized , your house will look and feel a lot bigger. People differ on whether bright paint colors make a room look bigger, or whether darker colors actually make a room look large. My own home is full of color: All in all, living small successfully means staying mindful of the physical objects you choose to live with. And many small home owners would say the same, including Weaver. Do you live in a small home? What has your experience been?
