Chapter 2 : LSAT Prep Courses & Tutoring | Blueprint LSAT

The Law School Admission Test (LSAT) is unlike any test you've ever taken in your academic career. The LSAT is a skills-based exam designed to test the critical reading and analytical thinking skills that are crucial for success in law school.

Jul 17, at 4: For several generations of future lawyers, these in-class courses seemed the best “ or even the only “ way to prepare for standardized tests, including the all-important Law School Admission Test LSAT. But much has changed in the last few years. New and evolving technologies now offer students many alternatives to in-class LSAT prep courses. Are any of these alternatives as good as the traditional in-class options? In-class LSAT prep courses suffer from two overarching flaws: I have experienced each, both as an aspiring law student and as an in-class LSAT prep instructor. Variance in Instructor Quality In-class LSAT prep courses suffer from a crucial flaw “ significant inconsistencies in the quality of instruction. Some major companies hire teachers who only scored between the 79th and 90th percentiles. Although other companies at least require a 98th percentile score on an actual LSAT, a high score on the LSAT is certainly not sufficient to guarantee quality instruction. Truly great instruction requires experience over time. Many in-class LSAT prep companies, however, experience high instructor turnover, and most of their instructors have no more than a few months of experience. Because they simply cannot relate to the vast majority of LSAT students. Students have to mold their schedules around the course, rather than optimizing their prep time in a manner that is most convenient for them. This means that students juggling undergraduate courses or full-time employment must attend lengthy evening classes after a long day “ not the best set-up for learning. It is impossible for in-class instructors to adjust their teaching styles or pace to suit every student. In-class instructors must get through a set amount of lesson material in a predetermined amount of time, irrespective of the number of students enrolled or varying levels of student aptitude. There is simply no room for a more personalized approach to LSAT test prep. Not Personalized A related problem is the fact that limited in-class time means most students are unable to ask all their LSAT questions. Limited question-and-answer sessions leave many in-class LSAT students unable to get the guidance or clarification they need to improve. Moreover, there is no way to adjust in-class courses to ensure that available class time is spent on those areas where each student most needs assistance. For example, an in-class course may involve two hours of Reading Comprehension instruction one evening. For a student who is doing well on Reading Comprehension, this time might be far better spent on Logic Games i. Limited Access Last but not least: Ongoing access to prep materials is crucial, but in-class LSAT students are required to pay hefty fees to maintain their access to their prep materials. The LSAT is a unique standardized exam in that it is not content-based. You cannot just memorize and regurgitate on the LSAT exam; rather, you have to learn specific reasoning skills and then develop the ability to execute those skills under intense time pressure. The idea that a student should sign up for an LSAT course ten weeks before his or her target exam date is great from the perspective of the companies that stand ready to profit enormously by re-charging their students for continued access. But this is not an economical option for the vast majority of students, who may need more than two and a half months of study and practice to reach their target LSAT score. Remember, the LSAT is by far the most important factor in law school admissions “ given three to four times the weight of your undergraduate GPA! LSATMax eliminates the variance in instructor quality by allowing great instructors to scale course content to individual students in ways that are impossible for brick-and-mortar classes. Students can ask questions on real-time message boards and their posts are answered by qualified, experienced LSAT instructors. No naturals and no rookies. The platform also provides instant, detailed analytics highlighting strengths and weaknesses, giving students the personalized data they need to maximize their precious prep time. Finally, there is a better way to prepare for the LSAT.

Chapter 3 : FREE LSAT Practice Tests

The LSAT may very well be the exam for which the most outside study guides and study services exist, given the competition that still exists to be granted admission to the most competitive law schools in the country.

You can watch whiteboard video lessons, do daily drills, or complete Logic Games from anywhere. Personalized Help From Instructors: There are no live course options, but you can get one-on-one help if you crave a more interactive study experience than the HD video lectures. Seasoned LSAT instructors are available to help you navigate your weaker areas and provide customized homework and additional guidance if you need it. Alpha Score offers a range of study materials at an excellent price. You can speed up or slow down a video lecture to save time or to give yourself more time to absorb the information. Listen to the lecture at 1. Video playback at various speeds and live instruction are just some of their great features. Students can choose from a number of course options that give them access to one-on-one time with instructors if they need additional help with concepts or difficult questions. The small-group course and access to instructors outside of regularly scheduled sessions make The Princeton Review a popular option with students. Quality and Quantity of Study Material: There are many course options to choose from, but all of them give students access to a broad range of practice questions, online drills and study material, proctored practice exams, and recorded video lessons. The Princeton Review stands by the quality of its instruction by offering generous satisfaction and money back guarantees as well. Courses emphasize the in-person and live online options and are not geared to portability beyond regular access to the online materials from devices connected to the internet. Many students like the convenience and flexibility of studying for a few minutes whenever they get the chance on their smartphone or tablet; unfortunately, The Princeton Review has not yet developed an app for its LSAT courses. The lack of a mobile app may be a disappointment to some.
