This poem was the keystone of an art exhibit in Nashville in 1955. The best insurance for that, simply, is a tattle-tale heart. Some of the poems are epigrammatic and tongue-in-cheek: Promises of heaven, prospects of below. There he began to write extensively on the Key West experience. An Indigenous Journal, followed the next year by a return to journalism with the expansive features on Tennessee Williams and Richard Wilbur in the same publication. He continued his poetic offerings, but added in this collection short fiction as well. Emotion is tempered, unlike that of modernist Wallace Stevens in whose "Farewell to Florida" a century ago "Key West sank downward under massive clouds," and who "hates the weathery yawl" and "the vivid blooms" of that city. Like "Johnny Bible" this poem brings us closest to the heart of the man who writes the words. This book departed from his usual fare by being patently autobiographical, detailing the experience of being a co-dependent with a lover on cocaine. Completely in verse diary form, the book is strongly revealing and descriptive. The poems detail the freshness of a new relationship, romance; then the succeeding adverse effects of drug addiction. Was he ever mine? Was he ever his himself To give for me? The book also contains a substantial appendix, listing the work Ernest Hemingway wrote while living in Key West from 1934 to 1940. The book serves a juvenile audience, while also maintaining an adult readership for the Hemingway trivia presented. The book is divided into three sections. The last section is notable in that it is similar to the last section of the earlier Dandelion Dreams and Other Poems, where he speaks extensively on subjects such as faith and doubt. Rainer Maria Rilke plays a considerable influence on this work, as Steinhardt dissects and searches for the meaning of life. These included biographical remarks pertaining to several St. Louis authors such as Howard Nemerov and Tennessee Williams. Presently Steinhardt is writing almost exclusively fiction, and divides his time between Florida and St. Bibliography[edit] The Painting Birds Voices: Poems from the Missouri Heartland editor , B.
