His first job was as a machinist and he worked his way up to foreman in the assembly department. He worked as a machinist before becoming a supervisor in the plant. In he moved to Springfield, Ohio where he managed a branch of the business. He returned to Davenport three years later where the brothers began manufacturing steel gear wagons. Bettendorf initially served as secretary and manager of the company. A year later the citizens of the town elected to change its name to Bettendorf. The factory was built on a acre 0. They were able to output about one hundred tons of finished steel castings daily that were used in the construction of the railroad boxcars. A complete railroad car was built from raw materials in the east end of the plant to the finished product on the west end. They also had divisions that produced hand dollys to move rail cars, ice crushers, table-top cigar lighters, and a machine to compress and bundle wastepaper. The company also built the Meteor automobile between and They were later merged and named Micro-Westco. William Bettendorf died on June 3, and J. While William invented many of the products that the company manufactured, J. Parties, picnics and sporting competitions were held on a regular basis. A magazine called the Car Journal was published for employees and their families monthly. Employees who worked for the company ten years or more were enrolled in the Loyalty Club. As World War I took hold the company experienced labor shortages. Armenian and Greek immigrants had provided most of the labor force. Company recruiters were sent to Juarez, Mexico to find workers. A village was constructed to house the Mexican workers that came to Bettendorf and was called "Holy City. The company had built a series of one-room cottages to house the laborers. There were also two-story frame apartment buildings for the unmarried workers and some of the larger box cars were also used for housing. Holy City was demolished in the s and is now the sight of storage tanks owned by oil companies. Grave in Oakdale Cemetery By the Bettendorf plant was the largest railroad car manufacturing plant west of the Mississippi River and employed 3, people. In the plant was sold to J.
