Sub-series[ edit ] Dungeon The Early Years Donjon Potron-Minet [ edit ] With art by Christophe Blain and Christophe Gaultier , the five volumes of this series take place in an earlier era, describing events leading up to the creation of the titular dungeon. In English translation, the Dawn series is called Early Years. Albums 1 to 4 are drawn by Trondheim, 5 and 6 by Boulet. Marvin the dragon, old and blind, teams with Marvin the Red, a brash rabbit warrior. The first three volumes are drawn by Sfar, the others by various artists. The artist is Manu Larcenet. Dungeon Monstres Donjon Monsters [ edit ] Donjon Monstres features secondary characters from throughout the story. There is a wide variety of artists in the 12 volumes. Others[ edit ] The Zenith books begin at number 1, while Potron-Minet begins at and Crepuscule at , implying that the authors intended to produce an unprecedented number of books. However, in later interviews, he hinted that he had changed his mind and was seduced by the idea of creating a long-running and complex series of books, which seemed possible with the collaboration of several different authors. A third sub-series called Donjon Bonus exists of different editions black and white or smaller format omnibuses and work outside the comics, like the role-playing game Clefs en Mains. With the issuance of the last two volumes of Dungeon Twilight, Trondheim and Sfar emphasized in an interview that the main story was "completely done". Main characters[ edit ] Herbert the Duck is the "hero" of the story, and appears in at least Donjon Zenith and Crepuscule series. As his name suggests, he is a duck, although he has a humanoid body, and is covered in feathers. He is the possessor of the Sword of Destiny a parody of other mystical weapons in adventure books. This sword is unique in that it can talk, and that has many mystical powers, such as being able to glow in the dark, being able to summon former bearers when someone other than its legitimate user tries to hold it, and not allowing the use of any other weapon by its owner. Also, one side of its blade has the enigmatic property of being able to cut -and even behead- living beings without killing them. Marvin the Dragon serves as the reluctant instructor and protector of Herbert the Duck. Marvin is a fierce warrior who loves a good fight, but at the same time he is bound by the principles of his religion. He is a strict vegetarian, refuses to eat "human" or animal flesh and will not attack anyone who has insulted him. Like other dragons, he can breathe fire, but will do so only when strictly necessary. Initially caused by indigestion due to eating little blue mushrooms, Marvin is capable of producing a "Tong Deum", a large blast of fire-breath. He looks vaguely humanoid, with huge muscles and scarlet skin. Marvin is loyal to his boss, the Keeper - though not entirely averse to keeping him in the dark about certain matters. Hyacinthe de Cavallere aka the Dungeon Master or "the Keeper" is a greedy, yet lovable, capitalist who only cares about enriching himself by attracting adventurers and treasure-seekers to his Dungeon, where they will leave their corpses and possessions. In his youth, Hyacinthe was actually quite idealistic, and disguised himself as the nocturnal crime fighter "the Night Shirt". He is a tall, thin rabbit, colored bright red. He is a young warrior and very impetuous. Bibliography[ edit ] The following tables show all French paperback collections released so far, with information about English releases.
