Eldridge Street Synagogue 12 Eldridge St. Wedged between Chinese restaurants, fish markets, and hair salons, the temple was designed and built more than a century ago, becoming the first Eastern European Orthodox Jewish synagogue in America. The congregation is still active, celebrating the Sabbath and performing religious services in the first-floor bes medrash. Docents provide informal tours, and visitors are welcome to wander, snap photos, or scan the selection of postcards and topical books. Kehila Kedosha Janina Broome St. The only Romaniote Greek Jewish synagogue remaining in the Western hemisphere, Kehila Kedosha Janina keeps alive the traditions of its founders, a band of Jewish immigrants from the Greek village of Janina who established the synagogue in Maps, posters, photographs, brochures, and a brief video trace the history of the Romaniotes. Docents are on hand to lead casual tours. Angel Orensanz Foundation Norfolk St. The oldest synagogue building in the city had been shut down and systematically vandalized for over a decade when Spanish sculptor Angel Orensanz swooped in, purchasing the property in and converting it into an art studio. Now known as the Angel Orensanz Foundation, the synagogue was designed by Berlin-born architect Alexander Saelzer, who intended for it to resemble the Cologne Cathedral. Upon its opening in , it was the largest synagogue in the country and could hold up to 1, worshippers. Bialystoker Synagogue Willett St. Built in , the Federal-style building originally housed a Methodist church and served as a stop on the Underground Railroad. A door along the balcony exposes a roughly year-old ladder leading to an attic where Canada-bound slaves hid during the Civil War. In a congregation of Polish Jews from Bialystok converted the building into a synagogue, transporting a stunning, three-story ark from Italy. Paintings of zodiac symbols corresponding to Jewish calendar months span the sanctuary ceiling. Bialystoker offers frequent services to its member congregation. Tour groups cluster in the narrow, dim, crumbling, and yet surprisingly ornate entryway before heading upstairs to visit the apartments. Tour tickets are sold online , by phone, or at the gift shop, which also carries black-and-white historic postcards, journals, and a slew of books on New York. East Broadway Landmarks Take a detour along a quiet stretch of East Broadway, home to a handful of turn-of-the-century Jewish landmarks as well as a small, active Orthodox community. Broadway, at Canal St. Broadway, between Clinton and Montgomery Sts. The oldest deli in New York est. A word of warning: Dried fruits and nuts, chocolates and cheeses line the shelves of this pristine specialty-food shop, run by the Russ family since Little inside the shop has changed since then, as evidenced by the historic photographs above the counters. Note that many of these stops are closed on Saturdays, the Jewish Sabbath, and that some of the featured synagogues have limited visiting hours. Visitors are advised to call and schedule an appointment in advance.
