That violated federal rules requiring organizations to identify the source of any money earmarked for a political expenditure, the commission determined. In SourceWatch, key articles on the Kochs include: Robert Maguire with the Center for Responsive Politics. ProPublica details another layer of the operation, in which Sean Noble led the way by establishing "disregarded entities" that were attached to the Center, but given their own inconspicuous acronym to make them appear unrelated to the Center. This same strategy was duplicated by other Koch-backed non-profits until about 20 "disregarded entities" were created to make flows of money between organizations like Freedom Partners and CPPR even less comprehensible. From there, the money was sent out to the organizations that would ultimately engage in political spending. But with the new strategy in place, it looked as though the money was broadly distributed. Barker and Meyer wrote, "At least 20 nonprofits across the country received at least half of their revenue from the Center, Freedom Partners or both. Both the Center to Protect Patient Rights and Freedom Partners responded "no" to a question on their IRS filings that asked if they had spent any money towards political ends. According to the Washington Times the ad "features the Democratic Senate incumbents insisting the Affordable Care Act can be repaired after its disastrous October roll-out, then shows other top Democrats saying there are no plans for a legislative fix. The ad accuses Reid of "attacking free speech. I will gladly endure them in order to call attention to the unscrupulous acts of these two barons. The Wall Street Journal described the ad as "criticizing Mr. Franken for supporting additional restrictions on tax-exempt issue-advocacy groups" and stated that the ad "derides efforts by the IRS and Senate Democrats to impose new rules on these nonprofits, citing complaints by the American Civil Liberties Union. According to the California Fair Political Practices Commission, "Under California law, the failure to disclose this initially was campaign money laundering. It was the largest amount of undisclosed dark money in the history of California. His vain attempts to try to minimize the case should not serve to give comfort to anyone who tries to hide money in California, because we are prepared to confront them at every turn. Though it has never reported any spending on federal candidates to the Federal Election Commission, the Coalition was listed as one of the groups mounting an attack against Ohio Democratic Senate candidate Sherrod Brown, according to the Huffington Post; Brown won his race. Physically, the organization existed only as a locked, metal mailbox, number , inside the Boulder Hills post office at the edge of a desert road north of Phoenix The effort was surrounded in such secrecy that when Noble was asked in a deposition who hired him, he declined to answer, citing confidentiality agreements.

The scope of how proximate human intervention is required to accomplish call origination would have to be defined in excruciating detail to provide guidance to call originators. The only authority granted to the Commission was to exempt new technologies. Also raises recent First Amendment challenges as a reason to consider trimming back the scope of the statute. Urges that the statutory definition should be faithfully applies including random or sequential number generation. Nice stuff Paul and Miriah. Their comment is suitably and predictably well presented. PACE starts by reminding the FCC that Congress made a policy choice when choosing to restrict dialers that use random or sequential number generation because they tend to tie up emergency lines and hospitals. It concludes with a searing one liner: The comment can be found here: As the Comment puts it: Good work Maria and team! Encore begins by noting that its never done this before but it realizes now how important this stuff is: And then it asserts: Encore then engages in an impassioned defense of predictive dialers and explains why they do not meet the statutory ATDS definition. Between the pervasive confusion over the definition of an ATDS and the abusive litigation environment, it has been a veritable minefield for legitimate callers to reach their customers. Now is the time for the FCC to put an end to the madness. Nice to see someone is truly fighting to stem the tide here beside just little ole me. All rights are reserved.

Email Print By Alicia H. And entitlement sounds bad. But what special stuff? And where are they getting it? Reformers claim that the special stuff comes from three main government programs: Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid. These are big programs. So if these programs entitle people to special privileges, then they should be reformed. Social Security is a terrific program. It makes us do what we would not do on our own – save for retirement. And it provides insurance in the event that we become disabled and for our dependents should we die early. Social Security benefits are adjusted for inflation, and they keep coming as long as we live. Social Security does need attention because projected benefits exceed scheduled taxes over the next 75 years. The good news is that the magnitude of the shortfall is totally manageable. And proposals abound for either reducing benefits or increasing revenues. Yes, those are the options. There is no magic bullet. My view is that we should close most of the gap by raising revenues, because Social Security will be the major source of retirement income for most Americans. Medicare is a health insurance program, financed by a combination of payroll taxes, premiums, and general revenues, to ensure that older Americans and the disabled can pay for health care. Medicare is a major contributor to the deficit, and reducing Medicare costs would help the long-run fiscal outlook. The solutions fall into two groups: Most proposals would reduce Medicare spending, but – without a reduction in total health care costs – would simply shift the burden from the government to the individual. Some popular suggestions include: The real solution is to control health care costs themselves. This goal is difficult to achieve. Only doctors and hospitals can do it. They are more likely to do it if payments are based on the quality of the care provided patients rather than the number of procedures. None of the usual suspects for cutting Medicare are likely to improve the incentives to practice better medicine. It also pays for long-term care for elderly persons who have depleted their resources. Medicaid is both a major contributor to the federal long-term deficit and a huge drain on state budgets. The projected increase in expenditures is driven by soaring health care costs and, as in the case of Medicare, by a rising number of older Americans who will need long-term care. These people are typically widows in their 80s who live alone, have little income, and may be suffering from dementia or some other mental impairment. They generally have no alternative. The Affordable Care Act of included a long-term care insurance program, but the program turned out not to be financially viable. Social Security, Medicare, and Medicaid do not provide greedy people with special privileges. They provide the elderly and disabled some minimum income and health insurance after a lifetime of contributions and offer health insurance for the poor. These programs do need attention. Social Security faces a financial shortfall and should be fixed – the sooner, the better. The future of Medicare and Medicaid is inextricably tied to the cost of health care. This country pays more and gets worse health outcomes than most other developed nations. We need to practice better medicine.
