Mobile The differences between English and Russian Introduction: Russian is part of the Slavonic branch of the Indo-European language family. Russian is spoken as a mother tongue by about million people in Russia and the former republics of the USSR. English and Russian are very different in many important aspects. In particular the grammar systems show significant variations. English has a fairly fixed word order. Meaning is expressed through the addition of words for example auxiliaries and movement of words within limited boundaries. Russian, on the other hand, conveys meaning largely through changes in the composition of words e. Its word order is very fluid. Because of these differences Russians often find learning English a serious challenge. Russian is written using the Cyrillic alphabet, some of whose letters are similar to letters in the Latin alphabet used by English. Russian learners of English may experience initial problems writing in English. These problems should decline as, following the fall of the Iron Curtain, Russians become more exposed to English in their everyday lives. Due to differences in the phonological systems, it is relatively difficult for Russians to acquire native-speaker-like standards of pronunciation and intonation. Russian consists of 5 vowel sounds, with no differentiation between short and long vowels. This contrasts with English which has 12 vowel sounds 5 long, 7 short , plus 8 diphthongs. Russian has a similar number of consonants to English, but their sounds do not fully overlap. The ng sound at the end of words like sing or thinking is difficult for Russian learners to produce accurately. Such words often end up as sin or thinkin. Russian has variable stress patterns, as English. However Russian learners may give undue prominence to words that English native speakers would swallow; for example as and has in the following sentences: Russian learners may ask questions with falling instead of rising intonation, which does not sound polite to English native speakers. Russian and English convey meaning through the verb systems in different ways. The Russian system is based in the concept of aspect: This is shown by appending affixes to the verb stem. There are few auxiliary verbs. This contrasts with English which has progressive and perfect tense forms, and avoids the need for affixation or inflection by the extensive use of auxiliaries. These differences result in problems in many areas. For example beginning learners often omit the auxiliary in questions or negatives: How you do that? The present simple is commonly used where the progressive form or perfect is needed: In comparison with Russian the modal verb system in English is very complex. Mistakes such as Must you to work on Friday? The lack of a copula in Russian leads to errors such as She good teacher. Russian has no articles. This causes significant problems because the whole concept of article use is alien to Russian learners of English, and the English article system itself is extremely complex. All Russian nouns are one of three genders. This results in problems such as: Have you seen my book? I put her on the table. Russian is a largely phonetic language. This is certainly not the case in English, and usually causes Russian learners serious difficulty and frustration. There are aspects of the Russian language which, if directly transferred into English conversation, may sound abrupt or impolite to English native speakers: Would you like to play tennis tomorrow?
