Client “ Individual, family, group or community. Community “ Interactions among groups of people with common bonds and environment. Health Care Reform Americans are living shorter and less healthy lives than people in other industrialized countries. Forces have led to a situation where health care costs have become out of control and people have become increasingly dissatisfied with the care available. Forces factors affecting change include demographics, social forces, economics, technology and health care delivery. This fundamental change in the payment process paved the way for the shift from hospital to community-based care. Increasing the span of healthy life, reducing health disparities among populations, and achieving access to preventive services for all Americans. Health Care Refocused Hospitals are declining in use and importance as health care moves to a community-based system with focus on wellness, prevention and cost-effectiveness. The health care delivery system is changing dramatically in response to tighter resources and greater health demands. The number of home health care agencies, stand-alone clinics, and rehabilitation centers is growing rapidly. The major components of the new health care delivery system are primary prevention, disease control, maintenance of chronic conditions, and cost-effectiveness as well as elimination of environmental hazards and individual responsibility for health related behaviors. Clients admitted to hospitals today to receive critical, intense medical treatment, stays are short and recovery takes place in the community not in the hospital with family assuming much of the care once carried out by the nurse. Specific Implications for Nursing Education Health care emphasis is on the family, aggregate, and community levels. The goal of the nurse in the community is to keep clients at functional levels of wellness. The NLN National League for Nursing has charged basic nursing education programs with implementing reforms to ensure graduates across all programs are competent to function in community-based health care settings. Community-Based Nursing As defined earlier, takes place where the clients live, work and play. The philosophy related to CBN is the human ecological model, which describes human development throughout the course of life. It is based on the principals of social justice, that everyone is entitled to basic necessities such as adequate income and health care. The nurse is the major health care professional on this team! Community Health nurses use a population-focused approach, and this focus is concerned with aggregates groups of people with common or similar problems that can be very broad or specific.
