

Chapter 1 : Avenue du Mont-Royal Est, Montréal QC - Walk Score

It is a tree-lined boulevard which runs south from the pont Saint-Michel on the Seine river and the Place Saint-Michel, crosses the boulevard Saint-Germain and continues alongside the Sorbonne and the Luxembourg gardens, ending at the Place Camille Jullian just before the Port-Royal railway station and the avenue de l'Observatoire.

Turkey Quartier Latin the name alone evokes images of bohemian Paris at its height. The heart of St. Michel is still the Place St. Michel with its baroque fountain of St. Michel killing a demon of some sort. This was once the site of numerous protests and social uprisings. One of the main events of French resistance to the occupying Nazis took place in the square, and in the now legendary riots of 1968, students took charge of the square in the face of tear gas and police clubs, declaring it an independent state! This was once the "Washington Square Park" of Paris, filled with hippies, artists, writers, poets, dancers, musicians and art students. Michel in the extreme conditions of an late spring chill. The Latin Quarter is bisected by the Boulevard St. Germain and the Boulevard St. These are the two main arteries running through the area, with the hundreds of crooked streets leading off them like capillaries. The tree lined Place St. Michel until you reach the intersection of Blv. The two streets intersect near the Cluny Museum on Boulevard St. Michel, a museum well worth visiting. It is set inside the ancient Roman baths an astounding feat of architecture in itself and filled with incredible artifacts and artwork from Medieval Europe, I find it to be one of the most interesting and beautiful museums in Paris. Inside you will find the famous "Lady and the Unicorn" tapestries as well as the original heads knocked from the statues at the Notre Dame Cathedral, stained glass, jewelry, early paintings, stonework, and even a Medieval garden. I prefer the cafes on the higher end of the street after you pass the Cluny, which are generally less crowded and more authentic as far as bistros go. There are good used bookstores and art book stalls to browse through here. This is no coincidence the Sorbonne is just a few blocks away and the students are always on the lookout for cheap deals on their required reading. Take a little detour and inspect the legendary university, or stop at the nice little Place de la Sorbonne square on your left, and enjoy a coffee among chain-smoking, tragic-faced students. For a treat, though not an overpriced one, go to Brasserie Balzar at 49 rue des Ecoles near the Sorbonne which has been open since 1830, but make sure you have a reservation if you are going on Friday or Saturday night. For those still on Blvd St Michel just keep walking and turn left off the rue Soufflot and you will eventually run into the Pantheon. Pantheon is a Greek word, meaning "all the Gods", which in this case means, the Gods of French literature, arts and sciences. All the big shots are buried here, in what is essentially a massive mausoleum. It was originally built as a church for which the foundations were laid in 1755. After the revolution, the new government decided it was more politically correct to rename it a mausoleum for the interment of French genius. Unable to make up their minds all this philosophy has confused them the French have twice reverted this building to being a church, and twice revoked its status. If you look up toward the main pediment as you enter the building, the inscription reads: Aux grandes hommes la patrie reconnaissante For great men, the grateful nation No, there is no application process! By the way you are now very close to the Luxembourg Gardens so plan to go in and walk around and enjoy one of the most beautiful green areas of Paris with the many people who come here when the weather is nice. If you head back down toward the river, you can loop around the back of the Cluny Museum and investigate the small streets which have now been inundated by Tunisian kebab shops and wannabee Greek restaurants. No self respecting Greek with a good restaurant will stand on the street and break plates for you. This is what you will find in the ultra-touristy rue de la Huchette. These guys mostly pose as Greeks by yelling OPA! I love a good North African specialty, so why these places are determined to make you think you are in Athens, when you are clearly not, is beyond me but maybe you were on your way to Athens and just kinda got stuck here and this will have to do. How good the food is I could not tell you having done little more than chat with the doormen but they create very appetizing window displays that may entice you to enter. There are a few bars, some with live music, romantic singer-songwriters on piano or guitar, male or female. Keep walking down the alley, cross the street and you will eventually run into the Shakespeare and Company Bookstore at 37 rue de la Bucherie. This is truly a sight not to miss. Of all the English language bookstores in Paris, this one has the most interesting feel. The shop is a remake of the original bookstore which was damaged by fire. The bookstore continues to offer refuge to young writers and poets who are allowed to sleep in the shop in exchange for some hours work. If this seems strange, I think it should be commended as a remarkable act of generosity and empathy in an age when things like this no longer happen. The architecture of the shop is interesting a maze of leaning shelves, secret cubbyholes, piles of books, old sofas, posters and the occasional cat. This is a place to be preserved and admired along with those who keep it running. If you are going to buy a book, why not buy it here and help support this little enclave of culture. The benches and fountain outside the shop are also a wonderful place to sit and watch the Notre Dame across the river. If you are interested in a fine example of the "flamboyant gothic style" check out the nearby church of St. This church was named after a 6th century recluse and apparently took longer to build than the nearby Notre Dame. There is a 15th century ossuary bone garden inside as well as an exceptional stained glass window depicting the seven sacraments. Roualt was trained as a stained glass artisan hence the obvious reference in his later famous paintings with their distinct color patches. Continue down the rue Galande to see the historic church of St. Chances are you will recognize this scene from countless paintings. Because this church was begun in , it may be the official oldest church in Paris. In the 17th century it was taken over by the Hotel Dieu, became a salt warehouse, and was eventually given to a branch of the Byzantine church run by Melchite Greeks! The garden is a beautiful spot to sit and try to imagine the left bank as it was in the 16th century. This is the medieval heart of Paris. All three of these hotels are 2-star and economical. Chapter 2 : 3 star hotel paris 5 - Hotel Beauvoir in the Latin quarter

The studious Latin Quarter is bubbling with life! Pubs and restaurants have sprouted up around the famous "Boul Mich." To help you find the perfect place, TheFork has selected the best restaurants near Saint Michel for you.

To discover the quintessential Latin Quarter ambience, take a stroll down the Quai de la Tournelles, which runs along the Seine River. Les Bouquinistes are riverside book sellers along the quays around the Pont Marie bridge. This popular open-air bookshop features separate stalls stocked with classic and modern literary works. In addition to used and new books, there are also postcards and posters for sale. This contemporary restaurant features the gourmet cuisine of Guy Savoy. In an enchanting location near the Pont Neuf, the restaurant offers views of the Seine River and the books stalls set up along the quay. This Bohemian bookshop sells old editions of everything from Shakespeare to James Joyce. Shakespeare and Company is a well-known gathering place for writers, and some of the in-house writers even live here, sleeping on cots in between the library aisles. The dining room dazzles guests with its spectacular views of the Notre-Dame Cathedral. The refined and expensive restaurant is famous for its classic French cuisine. Be sure to make a reservation in advance and wear appropriate attire. Another exquisite historic church, the Eglise Saint-Etienne-du-Mont was built in the 15th century from the Late Gothic period to the Renaissance. The architecture shows the evolution of styles. The nave of the church features stellar Gothic vaulting, while the round pillars were influenced by Renaissance design. The church is famed for its rood-screen, which has a central marble section and a spiral staircase at each end. At the entrance to Our Lady Chapel are the epitaphs of the philosopher Blaise Pascal and the dramatist Jean Racine, who are buried in the church. The church is also said to contain a stone from the tomb of Saint Genevieve. Spectacular 15th to 16th-century stained-glass windows depict scenes of the Apocalypse and the Parable of the Marriage Feast. On warm days, students like to linger on the arcaded patio and steps of the theater. Take a stroll and discover the trendy boutiques and happening restaurants. For a change of scenery just a few steps away, the tranquil Jardins du Luxembourg are a perfect place to relax and enjoy a picnic lunch in the setting of a formal French garden. It was built in High Gothic style between the mid-14th and mid-15th century. In the 15th and 16th centuries, the Rector of the University was elected in this church, and its bell was rung to announce the beginning of lectures. The interior of Saint-Julien-le-Pauvre Church is dominated by an icon-decorated screen installed in 1630. The college soon developed into a leading school of theology and became a university. During the reign of Napoleon, the Sorbonne was considerably enlarged and was given the status of a State university. The present buildings were constructed between 1820 and 1840 with 22 large lecture halls and hundreds of classrooms. The main front of the Sorbonne on Rue des Ecoles is decorated with allegorical representations of the sciences. In the courtyard of the Sorbonne is a Baroque chapel built between 1660 and 1670. A legacy of the Royal Garden of medicinal plants kept by King Louis XIII in the 17th century, this lush green space is a tranquil spot to relax and escape to nature, right in the heart of Paris. The Jardins des Plantes includes a Botanical Garden with an exceptional variety of flowers and plants. The gardens have a special focus on biodiversity and support ecology programs. The museum is also a place of study for students from the nearby University of Paris. The Lutetia Arena is the remains of an ancient Roman amphitheater of Paris, discovered in 1863. These ruins give an idea of the huge size of the original amphitheater, once used to stage gladiator and animal fights. The elliptical arena was 56 meters long by 48 meters across, roughly the same size as the interior of the Colosseum in Rome. Although the amphitheater had only 36 tiers of seating, it could accommodate an audience of 17,000, which was almost the entire population of the city during antiquity. Discover an oasis of Islamic culture right in the Latin Quarter, just a few steps away from the Museum of Natural History. A relatively recent addition to the neighborhood, the Grand Mosque of Paris was built between 1926 and 1931. The mosque is frequented by the local Muslim community but also offers tourists a unique and exotic experience. The interior of the Grand Mosque is a stunning masterpiece of Hispano-Moorish style. The prayer hall features magnificent carpets, and the hammam replicates the baths of North Africa with colorful mosaic tile decorations. Featuring delicately adorned archways, the patio was inspired by the Alhambra Palace in Granada. It is also possible to visit the traditional hot and cold baths and relax in the sauna. Check the schedule; certain days are reserved for men, others for women. For those who want to learn more about the architecture, guided visits are available. The tea salon and restaurant entrance is at a different location from the mosque, on a parallel street. For instance, the museum displays Moroccan objects of art from his trip to Morocco in Highlights of the collection include the Magdalene in the Desert painting exhibited at the Salon and another religious composition called the Education of the Virgin, painted in These highly-rated hotels are in the Latin Quarter: At the other end of Boulevard Saint-Germain, boutique Odeon Hotel has soundproof windows and is a five-minute walk from the Metro and Luxembourg Gardens. Only a block from the Cluny Museum, some rooms at Hotel du College de France have good-sized balconies with chairs and tables. Almost next door, on a quiet street, Hotel Marignan includes free breakfast and laundry facilities. This guided evening stroll will take you from medieval Paris to the haunts of Picasso, the beat poets, and Jim Morrison.
