Posted on August 25, by laurakvasnosky 8 comments Wren, Oregon “ Early Monday morning we slipped under the wire fence and climbed a hillside cow pasture, then watched while the light dimmed and crickets tuned up their fiddles. As the moon slipped in front of the sun, the skies darkened to indigo and the most wondrous jewel was revealed, hanging in the sky where the sun had been “ a total solar eclipse. Then roosters crowed and the skies began to lighten again. Over the next hours, as the eclipse moved coast to coast across America, millions of people shared our gobsmacked, goosebumped wonder. Eclipses have amazed humans for a long time. Ancient Mesopotamian warriors who witnessed a solar eclipse on May 28, BC interrupted a longstanding war between the Medes and the Lydians. They saw the eclipse as an omen. Fighting immediately stopped and they agreed to a truce. Note the wolves wear protective sunglasses and the white ink glows in the dark. My friend, photographer Max Waugh got some amazing shots from Central Oregon. Max Waugh In Seattle, my friend Karen captured the effect of the eclipse on leaf shadows in her driveway. Another friend, Melanie, set up an Optical Sun Projector with binoculars and snapped photos as the reflection crossed a screen. One lens is occluded to allow for one image. This will project a reflection onto a screen. I made my screen out of white black-out fabric and made a little tent over to help balance light. Before the advent of photography, artists painted the eclipse. Check out his methods here. I am a longtime fan. I wear a crescent moon necklace. The moon has a starring role in my picture books, too. I love how Kate painted the moonlight into our book. The disc of the moon fits perfectly over the sun. Quite a memorable Partial Reunion Total Eclipse.
