But the apparent normality belies a simmering conflict inside the leading independent newspaper which has been fiercely critical of President Recep Tayyip Erdogan and seen several of its staff prosecuted and jailed. The root of the tumult has on this occasion, however, not been the legal troubles under Erdogan, who has been repeatedly accused of riding roughshod over the media in Turkey and hampering freedom of expression. It stems from a longstanding row between the liberal and nationalist flanks at the paper that resulted in wholesale changes at board level earlier this month. Since then, nearly 30 journalists, including several veterans, have quit the nearly year-old paper, raising fears about the stability of one of the very few dailies in Turkey that still criticises the government. That thorn has now lost its sharpness," he told AFP. Critics denounced the move, which triggered a flood of resignations, as a management coup. Celebrated names like veteran journalist Kadri Gursel and cartoonist Musa Kart -- both of whom spent months in jail in a hugely controversial trial on terror propaganda charges -- have now left the paper. The management changes mark "the failure of an attempt to create an open newspaper, not sectarian", he told AFP. Even during the terror propaganda trial -- which resulted in the conviction of 14 of its staff earlier this year -- the two camps had been at loggerheads. The ideological battle for the heart of the daily was exposed when 17 of its staff went on trial last year on "terror" charges. Members of the ousted team have accused the authorities of a "palace revolution" supported by a pro-Erdogan judiciary aimed at ushering in changes at the newspaper. These allegations are "disgusting," said Sukran Soner, a new board member and celebrated journalist at Cumhuriyet, where she made her debut in The former management denies this. One thing is for sure -- the departure of so many lauded writers from Cumhuriyet is an "inestimable loss for Turkish journalism" at a time when over 90 percent of the media is controlled by people close to Erdogan, said Erol Onderoglu, Turkey representative of Reporters Without Borders. Veteran writer Engin said he believed it might be possible for a liberal team to return "one day" to the head of Cumhuriyet because, after all, "the history of this newspaper is full of twists and turns, for better or worse". But being in his 70s, it was over for him, he admitted. I will not return.
