What really stuck since college? The crushes on musicians in black turtlenecks came and went. The impact of Beowulf and Bio 6 class, unfortunately, faded too. But lessons of tolerance, first learned through my freshman roommate, left a lasting impression. She expanded my cultural horizons, and stretched my comfort zone. My side of the room had stripes. I brought cassette tapes of Foreigner and Phil Collins. She brought Madonna and Tears for Fears. She brought Kentucky Derby shot glasses. I graduated from a small parochial school in Boston. She came from a large public school in Kentucky. We decided to meet at the food court in a mall the summer before freshman year. I chose the veggie pocket; she chose the meatball sub. By orientation, we hardly crossed paths. I hung out at Hillel House. She hit the frats. At the dorm icebreaker, we stood on opposite sides of the lounge. Our resident counselors advised us all to look beyond our differences. As if on cue, Hurricane Gloria hit Providence our first semester, testing our freshman resolve with category-three gust winds. We hunkered down in Jameson House, the heel of the west quad dorm, smacking down window tape to cover any leaks, and, of course, taking inventory of our prized mini-fridge "microwave popcorn, squeeze yellow mustard, chunky monkey, check, check, check. By Christmas break, my roommate invited me home to Kentucky. The smell of homemade chocolate bourbon balls wafted over and greeted me at the door. My roommate suggested the windowsill upstairs, a sacred space of its own, so others could admire it from the street. Likewise, I invited my roommate home for Passover. She sat at the Seder table, speechless by the oversized burnt crackers, and the jiggle of the gefilte fish. Then, as her elbow accidentally hit the table, spilling her first, second, fourth cup of wine, she turned as beet-red as the bitter herbs. Later that spring, genuinely puzzled, I looked across the room and asked: And just like that, our deadpan dialogue broke into doubled over laughter. Sophomore and junior year, we traded in our Jack Klugman and Tony Randall routines for going separate ways. We were studying abroad in Israel and Kenya, respectively. And by the time the postcards of romantic escapades, waterfalls, temples, and safaris had come undone from so much sticky putty on cinderblock dorm walls, it was time to come home. Senior year, we decided to be roommates again. But this time, we filled an off-campus apartment at 9 Pitman Street with half our freshman dorm. My room had stripes. Our first major investment? Fast forward 25 years to the Kentucky Derby party I look forward to every year. This year, I show up with a blender under my arm, and 7-year-old twin boys in tow. The kids climb under the coat pile, entangling themselves in crafts until the race begins.
