History[edit] The National Trust was incorporated in as an "association not for profit" under the Companies Acts 1900, in which the liability of its members was limited by guarantee. It was later incorporated by six separate Acts of Parliament: The National Trust Acts 1907, 1937, 1939, 1952, and 1953. Also the preservation of furniture, pictures and chattels of any description having national and historic or artistic interest. In the early days, the trust was concerned primarily with protecting open spaces and a variety of threatened buildings; its first property was Alfriston Clergy House, and a decorative cornice there may have given the trust its sprig of oak symbol. Many were donated to the trust in lieu of death duties. The last is a particularly notable asset as it comprises an art collection, Corfe Castle, Studland Bay, Badbury Rings and a host of commercial and domestic buildings and land. In response, the council asked Sir Henry Benson to chair an advisory committee to review the structure of the trust. Following the publication of the Benson Report in 1962, much of the administration of the trust was devolved to the regions. The building was constructed on an abandoned railway yard, and is intended as a model of brownfield renewal. Historic England and its equivalents in other parts of the United Kingdom are government bodies that perform some functions which overlap with the work of the National Trust. At an operational level, the trust is organised into regions which are aligned with the official local government regions of the UK. Its headquarters are in Swindon. In 2008, the governance of the trust was substantially changed by the Charity Commission. In addition, the trust receives money from its commercial arm, National Trust Enterprises Ltd, which undertakes profit-making activities such as running gift shops and restaurants at NT properties. The majority of them are country houses, and most of the others are associated with famous individuals. The majority of these country houses contain collections of pictures, furniture, books, metalwork, ceramics and textiles that have remained in their historic context. Most of the houses also have important gardens attached to them, and the trust owns some important gardens not attached to a house. The properties include some of the most famous stately homes in the country and some of the key gardens in the history of British gardening. The arrangements made with families bequeathing their homes to the trust often allowed them to continue to live in the property. Since its founding in 1895, the trust has gradually expanded its collection of art, mostly through whole property acquisitions. Since 1997, there has been a Curator of Pictures and Sculpture. The inalienability of trust land was over-ridden by Parliament in the case of proposals to construct a section of the Plympton bypass through the park at Saltram, on the grounds that the road proposal had been known about before the park at Saltram was declared inalienable. All photography at National Trust properties, other than that for private and personal use or for entry into approved competitions, is strictly prohibited, [27] [28] except for social networking sites such as Flickr.

These elegant horticultural labyrinths have been playfully confusing visitors for hundreds of years. This historical fascination is being fuelled by a boom in creating new mazes. Britain now has mazes of turf, water, brick, stone, wood, coloured paving tiles, mirrors and glass. Any exploration of the twists and turns of British mazes should include the oldest and most famous. He dug up an old orchard planted by Henry VIII and redesigned the garden in the formal style of the time. One of Jerome K. If you do manage to get out, there are also exquisite riverside gardens and the fabulous Tudor palace to see. Another great estate miles to the west has become one of the centres of British maze-making. A visit to Longleat in Wiltshire includes the ancestral stately home of Lord Bath, Capability Brown landscaped gardens, and a drive-through animal safari park plus six mazes. The newest of them, The Blue Peter Maze was built of timber specially for children. Serious maze enthusiasts are catered for by the grand Hedge Maze: The hedges are made from 16, yew trees and are laid out in curves to disorient the walker. The octagonal cypress maze has a pagoda at the centre - if you can find it. This has hands-on interactive displays and puzzles explaining the history, design and construction of mazes around the world. Lindsay is the creator of the museum and an acknowledged maze expert. Edward meanwhile takes care of the Hedge Maze, personally spending ten weeks doing all the trimming every year. The castle is set in 30 acres of magnificent gardens. A century ago the wealthy Astor family lived here and planted a yew maze which visitors can still explore. A more recent addition is the highly-acclaimed Water Maze on a shallow lake with an island at the centre. The walkways are made up of curved paths supported above the water on stilts. To make getting to the island even more difficult, some slabs, when stepped on, trigger a spray of water. Can you reach the island AND stay dry? The Forbidden Corner is another modern maze designed for maximum fun. In this award-winning labyrinth near Leyburn in the heart of the Yorkshire Dales, visitors follow meandering paths through tunnels, underground chambers and crenellated follies. Using clues on your ticket you must find your way round a huge pyramid made of translucent glass, paths and passages that lead nowhere, extraordinary statues and a network of underground paths, including very narrow passageways and a revolving room. The brainchild of eccentric local millionaire Colin Armstrong was originally built as a private family folly but due to public demand was subsequently opened. The maze craze continues north of the border in Scotland. Lord Cawdor planted a holly hedge maze in in the historic walled garden. He copied a design set in the mosaic floor of a ruined Roman villa in Portugal.

Chapter 3 : National Garden Scheme - National Garden Scheme

If you are planning a trip to England and/or Wales and want to know which gardens are open on what days, plus which of those days selected gardens are open for charity, this is the book to buy. GARDENS OPEN FOR CHARITY () is updated every year.

Things to see and do Grasslands Garden Wander through wild landscapes featuring spectacular plants from North American prairie and South African grasslands. The new Grasslands Garden celebrates critically threatened wild landscapes and has species flowering across the summer months, from pasqueflower to prairie dock and goldenrods to wild gladiolus. Complementing the new World Gallery, the naturalistic planting scheme was devised by Olympic Park designer James Hitchmough. Display Gardens These botanical displays have been carefully created by our gardeners and curators to unite our indoor and outdoor collections. They reflect themes from the materials which make up our anthropology collection , to outdoor examples of instruments to be found in the Music Gallery. By , it had fallen into disrepair. The structure was dismantled and moved to its current site where it was beautifully restored with the help of English Heritage. It re-opened in and is used for performances, workshops, and as a function room. The Conservatory is available for hire. Bandstand Enjoy a breathtaking vista of London from this restored Bandstand built in from a design by Charles Harrison Townsend. It is a focal point for our outdoor summer events programme such as concerts or film screenings, while surrounding terrace provides a large picnic area with stunning views. The Bandstand is available for hire. It now provides a useful indoor shelter for picnics in inclement weather. Pavilion Our new pavilion building makes the most of the stunning skyline, while playing host to community and education events. The Pavilion is available for hire. Wildlife Garden An outdoor classroom packed with ideas for how to attract wildlife to gardens and green spaces. Groups can book it for their own use, and we also run facilitated school and community group sessions. Visit the Learning pages to find out more about visiting with your school or group. South Downs A quiet contemplative area at the eastern edge of the site offering views over Kent and the South Downs. Perfect for a picnic. Meadow field A large green space below the Bandstand and the area of the Gardens where dogs are allowed off the lead. Sundials Established with the help of the British Sundial Society , the Horniman Gardens are home to a unique collection of sundials. Follow our trail and see how many you can find on your visit. The railway was closed in and the area was left unmanaged until This resulted in it becoming a wild woodland area. Today, the trail is managed carefully to encourage a wide variety of plants, birds, insects and other animals which depend on each other for survival. Pond and meadow habitats have been introduced to attract new species, and a log pile area is home to dozens of different mini beasts, including the endangered stag beetle. The trail is a sensitive area and much time goes into managing it for your enjoyment. Please help us to look after the area by not taking dogs onto the trail and by taking all of your litter home with you. Guide dogs are allowed. Please do not pick any leaves or flowers. They are an important part of the nature trail habitats and some can be sharp or sting. The main entrance to the Nature Trail is located on the cycle path that runs parallel with the Museum and Gardens and can be accessed from London Road. It is open from 9am - 4pm, but may be closed at short notice during bad weather. Please check with the Information Desk at the start of your visit or call Animal Walk A new addition in , the Animal Walk lets visitors walk through the centre of the enclosures for a close encounter with its furry and feathered residents. Activity Packs and Trails.
