April 2, at 3: The backlash was swift, not only in Washington, but also from international trading partners. In response, Trump and his economic team attempted to diffuse the situation by providing temporary tariff exemptions to allied trading partners, including Canada, Mexico, the European Union, and Australia. Nevertheless, financial markets sold off swiftly this month in unison with these announcements. The selloff did not necessarily occur because of the narrow scope of these specific announcements, but rather out of fear that this trade skirmish may result in large retaliatory tariffs on American exports, and ultimately these actions could blow up into a full-out trade war and trigger a spate of inflation. Bloomberg These trade concerns are valid, but at this point, I am not buying the conspiracy theories quite yet. Often, the heated language is solely used as a first foray into more favorable negotiations. Beginning in early February, anxiety in the equity markets intensified as interest rates on the benchmark year Treasury note have now risen from a September-low yield of 2. While the direction of rate increases may be unnerving to some, both the absolute level of interest rates and the level of inflation remain relatively low, historically speaking see inflation chart below. Even if the Federal Reserve increases their interest rate target range another two to three times in as currently forecasted, we will still be at below-average levels, which should still invigorate economic growth all else equal. In car terms, if the current strategy continues, the Fed will be moving from a strategy in which they are flooring the economic pedal to the medal, to a point where they will only be going 10 miles per hour over the speed limit. The strategy is still stimulative, but just not as stimulative as before. At some point, rising interest rates will slow down or choke off growth in the economy, but I believe we are still a long way from that happening. Why am I not worried about runaway interest rates or inflation? Ed Yardeni With the Japanese year government bond yielding 0. While either scenario is possible, given the lack of rising inflation and the slack in our employment market, I believe scenario 2 is more likely to occur than scenario 1. Privacy, Politics, and Facebook: A lot has recently been made of the 50 million user profiles that became exposed and potentially exploited for political uses in the presidential elections. How did this happen, and what was the involvement of Facebook Inc. The genesis of this particular situation began when Aleksandr Kogan, a Russian American who worked at the University of Cambridge created a Facebook quiz app that not only collected personal information from approximately , quiz-takers, but also extracted information from about 50 million Facebook friends of the quiz takers data scandal explained here. Kogan believed to be in his early 30s allegedly sold the Facebook data to a company called Cambridge Analytica, which employed Steve Bannon as a vice president. This is the same Steve Bannon who eventually became a senior adviser for the Trump Administration. Now, the CEO Chief Executive Officer of Facebook, Mark Zuckerberg, faces an appointment in Washington DC, where he will receive tongue lashings and be raked over the coals, so politicians can better understand the breakdown of this data breach. It is certainly possible that a large amount of data was compromised for political purposes relating to the presidential election. Even if there are defectors, where will all these renegades go, Instagram? Well, if that were the case, Instagram is owned by Facebook. Financial markets move up and financial markets down. The first quarter of reminded us that no matter how long a bull market may last, nothing money-related moves in a straight line forever. Suffice it to say, next month will likely introduce new concerns, but one thing I do not need to worry about is an empty Easter basket. It will take me much longer than a month to work through all the jelly beans, chocolate bunnies, and marshmallow Peeps.
