Television Researchers have acknowledged that other domains of general knowledge may exist. Factor analysis suggested that the 20 domains could be categorised into six factors: All six of these factors were highly intercorrelated. The existence of a single general factor suggests that individual differences across a range of knowledge domains may have both common causes and specific influences; interest in a particular area and educational course content appear to be important contributors. IQ has been found to robustly predict general knowledge scores even after accounting for differences in age, sex, and five factor model personality traits. Standardized IQ tests may therefore include measures of general knowledge, such as in the information subtest of the Wechsler Adult Intelligence Scale. Individual differences in the efficiency of such processes might explain why all domains of semantic memory appear to be intercorrelated. Though one study found that extraversion and neuroticism were negatively correlated with general knowledge, [9] others found that they were unrelated. In a comparison between male and female university students in 19 domains of academic knowledge, males had greater knowledge in 14 domains, especially in physical science and technology, but also in humanities and civics. A study of university students in Northern Ireland found that males scored higher in general knowledge than females, as well as in 12 of 19 specific knowledge domains. Females scored moderately higher than males in medicine and cookery. The authors of this study suggested that this male advantage most likely reflects differences in interests rather than differences in verbal or memory ability. General knowledge test scores predicted exam results, even after controlling for IQ, five factor model personality traits, and learning styles. Proofreading[ edit ] General knowledge has been found to robustly predict proofreading skills in university students. In a multiple regression analysis using general knowledge, general intelligence, verbal reasoning, five factor personality traits, and learning styles as predictors, only general knowledge was a significant predictor. Creativity[ edit ] General knowledge has been found to have weak associations with measures of creativity. The relationship between general knowledge and divergent thinking became non-significant when controlling for fluid intelligence. Game shows and quizzes[ edit ] Many game shows use general knowledge questions. Game shows such as Who Wants to Be a Millionaire? Some shows ask questions both on specific subjects and on general knowledge, including Eggheads and Mastermind. In Mastermind, contestants choose their own "specialist subject" before answering general knowledge questions, whereas in Eggheads the subjects are chosen at random. Questions drawn from the game Trivial Pursuit have been utilised in a number of psychological experiments concerning general knowledge.
