Oh, if only Uncle Matt would send me a postcard; I could avoid this whole thing. Unfortunately, when Gobo peeked out the hole in the wall, he saw no telltale corner poking out of the wastebasket. He would have to journey into Outer Space to find his uncle Matt completely alone. Gobo retreated and sighed. What was he getting himself into? Red stared at the sash. Gobo gave me his only prize. She stared off in the direction Gobo had headed. If she hurried, she could catch Gobo before he left. She had some questions to ask him. Gobo took a deep breath, trying to calm his jumpy nerves. He smiled a little. Red was his biggest rival, but she was a great friend, too. Red was too much of a tomboy to think about him like that. As if she had been summoned, Red suddenly came barreling down the tunnel towards him. I was just about to head out to find Uncle Matt. And why did you have Wembley give it to me instead of doing it yourself? You know, since you like to win stuff. That sure sounded dumb. There was no safe excuse he could give. He had to tell her the truth. Am I really blushing? Because of something Gobo said? Since when do I get all mushy about Gobo? He meant to ignore the implications of her statement, but found himself blurting, "But will you miss me? The shock only multiplied when Red concluded her outburst with a tight hug. He returned the embrace, momentarily forgetting his anxiety about going into Outer Space and his concern for Uncle Matt. Eventually, Red pulled back, looking a little embarrassed, but at the same time vaguely triumphant. Gobo sensed her barriers were down and took the opportunity to say, "You could come with me. My place is here. Red was nothing if not stubborn, and he knew how truly afraid she was of Outer Space. The sorrowful shake of her head confirmed his suspicions. Gobo heard Doc, the Silly Creature, tell Sprocket, the hairy beast, that they were going to the grocery store. The two departed, leaving the workshop deserted and providing an easy exit for Gobo. He turned once again to Red. Red knew that Gobo would really leave this time. She tried to remain calm, but something inside of her was making her feel a kind of desperation, as if she would never see Gobo again. Oh, how girly, he thought to himself, but he still was thrilled that she seemed to like him, just as he definitely liked her. As was always the way with them, Gobo just had to one-up her. Her eyes widened as he leaned forward and gave her a peck right on the lips. If he waited too long, he would lose his nerve completely, and then Uncle Matt would surely get into deep trouble without his help. Your review has been posted.
