Chapter 1 : Florida Memory - The Black Experience Guide

About the Author. Barbara Lewis Burger is an archivist in the Still Picture Branch, Special Archives Division, National Archives and Records Administration. She has served as the Assistant Chief for Reference in the Still Picture Branch, and as the Assistant to the Director of Special Archives Division.

By law NARA is charged with safeguarding records of all three branches of the federal government. Its mission is to assure federal agencies and the American public ready access to essential evidence documenting the rights of citizens, the actions of government officials, and the national experience. NARA appraises, accessions, arranges, describes, preserves, and provides access to the essential documentation of the three branches of government; manages the presidential libraries; and publishes laws, regulations, and presidential and other public documents. It also assists the Information Security Oversight Office, which manages federal classification and declassification policies, and the National Historical Publications and Records Commission, which makes grants nationwide to help provide access to materials that document American history. While the need for a central, safe repository for government records was acknowledged from the early days of the republic, storage systems before the twentieth century were decentralized and haphazard. The offices that created the records also stored them, keeping them in whatever space happened to be available. Over the years, records were lost, destroyed by fire, or otherwise made nearly inaccessible. The National Archives Act, signed by President Franklin Roosevelt on 19 June , established a new agency to care for the records of the federal government and ensure that they endured for future generations. In the National Archives was put under the control of the General Services Administration, but it became an independent agency again—the National Archives and Records Administration—in NARA currently holds approximately 7 billion pages of textual records; 5. Much of the archival material, including special media such as still and motion pictures , sound recordings, maps, and electronic records, is housed in the National Archives at College Park, Maryland, and in the original National Archives Building in Washington, D. Eighteen regional records services facilities located across the country house records from the federal courts and the regional offices of federal agencies in the geographic areas they serve. To ensure proper documentation of the organization, policies, and activities of the government, NARA develops standards and guidelines for the management and disposition of recorded information. NARA also appraises federal records and approves records-disposition schedules, inspects agency records and records management practices, develops training programs, and provides guidance and assistance on proper records management. In addition, NARA contains a unique resource in its presidential libraries and presidential materials projects, which document the administrations of Presidents Hoover to Clinton. These institutions, though not strictly libraries, contain—in addition to museums—archival collections of records textual, electronic, visual, and audio from the Office of the President and presidential commissions, along with personal papers of the president, his family and associates, and members of his administration. Government Manual and Public Papers of the Presidents. It is also responsible for receiving and documenting Electoral College certificates for presidential elections and state ratifications of proposed constitutional amendments. Its grants help state and local archives, universities, historical societies, and other nonprofit organizations strengthen archival programs, preserve and process records collections, and provide access to them through the publication of finding aids and documentary editions of papers related to the Founding Era, to other themes, and to various historical figures. NARA is continually expanding the availability of its resources through the Internet. NARA also offers a variety of public programs to bring its resources to a wide audience. In the Washington area, at regional archives, and at presidential libraries, visitors may attend lectures, exhibits, film screenings, and conferences. Records held by NARA are arranged into numbered "record groups. Most record groups also contain records of predecessors of the organization named in the title. A great number of records have been recorded on microfilm both to preserve them and to make them more available to researchers. NARA has microfilmed more than 3, series of federal records, and copies are located at the two Washington-area archives buildings and in the various regional archives around the country. Records in all NARA locations provide information on government actions that have affected the entire nation and the individual home. It is published in print format and on the web. A series described in the National Archives Catalog, or in the published Guide to the Holdings of the Still Picture Branch, might contain several items or several hundred thousand items. Few series will ever be listed by individual item.

The Archivist not only maintains the official documentation of the passage of amendments to the U. Constitution by state legislatures, but has the authority to declare when the constitutional threshold for passage has been reached, and therefore when an act has become an amendment. It also administers the Electoral College. Congress established the National Archives Establishment in to centralize federal record keeping, with the Archivist of the United States as chief administrator. The first Archivist, R. Connor , began serving in , when the National Archives was established by Congress. In March , it was revealed by the Archivist of the United States in a public hearing that a memorandum of understanding between NARA and various government agencies existed to "reclassify", i. In , Executive Order created the National Declassification Center [10] to coordinate declassification practices across agencies, provide secure document services to other agencies, and review records in NARA custody for declassification. In , a retired employee pleaded guilty to stealing original sound recordings from the archives. Records include paper documents, microfilm, still pictures, motion pictures, and electronic media. Archival descriptions of the permanent holdings of the federal government in the custody of NARA are stored in the National Archives Catalog. However, records from other sources may still be protected by copyright or donor agreements. Federal government agencies pay a yearly fee for storage at the facility. In accordance with federal records schedules, documents at WNRC are transferred to the legal custody of the National Archives after a certain point this usually involves a relocation of the records to College Park. Temporary records at WNRC are either retained for a fee or destroyed after retention times has elapsed. WNRC also offers research services and maintains a small research room. Across the United States, the National Archives maintains both research facilities and additional federal records centers. In many cases, the research rooms of regional archives are located at the same site of the federal records center FRCs which are not accessible to the public. Public-private partnerships[ edit ] In an effort to make its holdings more widely available and more easily accessible, the National Archives began entering into public-private partnerships in . When announcing the agreement, Archivist Allen Weinstein said that this pilot program is "an important step for the National Archives to achieve its goal of becoming an archive without walls. Our new strategic plan emphasizes the importance of providing access to records anytime, anywhere. This is one of many initiatives that we are launching to make our goal a reality. For the first time, the public will be able to view this collection of rare and unusual films on the Internet. Allen Weinstein explained that this partnership would "allow much greater access to approximately 4. During the announcement, Weinstein noted that the agreement would " The website [29] features 3, documents, images, and recordings from the holdings of the Archives. The site also features lesson plans and tools for creating new classroom activities and lessons. In , the National Archives initiated a WikiProject on the English Wikipedia to expand collaboration in making its holdings widely available through Wikimedia. Notable crimes[ edit ] In , Robert Bradford Murphy and his wife, Elizabeth Irene Murphy were arrested and sentenced to ten years in prison for stealing documents from several federal depositories including the National Archives.
