Built in , she is sometimes referred to as the Natchez IX. Day trips include harbor and dinner cruises along the Mississippi River. One of the two tandem-compound steam engines on the Steamboat Natchez. Each engine produces horsepower and has the dimensions 7 feet by 30 inches by 15 inches. Her steam engines were built in for the steamboat Clairton, from which the steering system also came. From the SS J. Ayres were taken the copper bell, made of melted silver dollars. The bell has on top a copper acorn that was once on the Avalon now known as the Belle of Louisville , and on the Delta Queen. The Natchez IX also features a steam calliope that can play 32 notes. The wheel is made of white oak and steel, is 25 feet 7. From there, Ford planned to spend three days in the south appealing to Southern conservatism by depicting his opponent, Jimmy Carter , as a free-spending liberal. Previous vessels[ edit ] Jazz band on the Natchez, The first Natchez was a low pressure sidewheel steamboat built in New York City in Its most notable passenger was the Marquis de Lafayette , the French hero of the American Revolutionary War , in Fire destroyed her, while in New Orleans, on September 4, Built in Cincinnati, Ohio , as were all of her successors owned by Capt. Leathers sold this boat in She was abandoned in Leathers operated it from to On March 10, , she sank at Mobile, Alabama due to rotting. She operated for six weeks. On January 1, , the ship collided with the Pearl at Plaquemine, Louisiana , causing the Pearl to sink. A wharf fire on February 5, at New Orleans caused her to burn down, as did other ships. She was also equipped with six boilers, but this one could hold 4, cotton bales. This one was used by Leathers until In she was destroyed while serving as a wharfboat at Baton Rouge, Louisiana. The capacity was 5, cotton bales, but the power remained the same. It helped transport Jefferson Davis from his river plantation home on the Mississippi River after he heard he was chosen president of the Confederacy. Natchez was also used to transport Confederate troops to Memphis, Tennessee. After Union soldiers captured Memphis, the boat was moved to the Yazoo River. On March 13, , she was burned either by accident or to keep her out of Union hands at Honey Island. Remains were raised from the river in Lee , in a race from New Orleans to St. Louis in June , immortalized in a lithograph by Currier and Ives. This Natchez had beaten the previous speed record, that of the J. Stripped down, carrying no cargo, steaming on through fog and making only one stop, the Robert E. Lee won the race in 3 days, 18 hours and 14 minutes. By contrast, the Natchez carried her normal load and stopped as normal, tying up overnight when fog was encountered. Despite this she berthed only six hours later. One way Leathers tried to speed up his boat was giving all of his workers whiskey. When Leathers finally dismantled the boat in Cincinnati in , this particular Natchez had never flown the American flag. He cites Johnny Farrell, second engineer of the Natchez: When I went aboard the Lee, all they had done was to move the coal bunkers a little forward On our boat there was absolutely no preparation whatever. There was no such thing as colors flying, bands playing, and the decks of both boats crowded with ladies and gentlemen. She had 47 elegant staterooms. Camp scenes of Natchez Indians wardancing and sunworshipping ornamented the fore and aft panels of the main cabin, which also had stained glass windows depicting Indians. Declaring that the War was over, on March 4, , Leathers raised the American flag when the new Natchez passed by Vicksburg, the first time he hoisted the American flag on one of his ships since By lack of business had stymied the Natchez. In January she burned at Lake Providence, Louisiana. Captain Leathers, deciding he was too old to build a new Natchez, retired. Jefferson Davis sent a letter of condolences on January 5, , to Leathers over the loss of the boat. Much of the cabin was salvageable, but the hull broke up due to sand washing within. Leathers and his wife, Blanche Douglass Leathers in the s. Leathers, sometimes nicknamed "Old Push", [1] was described as savage, reckless, and colorful. He loved to prove his boats were the fastest. He would sometimes throw fatty bacon and hog fat into the engine to dramatically increase the speed of his boats. He would sometimes cause other boats to slow down by quickly racing in front of them. She mainly patrolled the Caribbean. A few weeks later, on May 28, she was reverted to her original name and status as Oceanographer AGS During construction she was acquired by the U. She served with distinction in World War II. The Brazilian Navy has also had a ship named Natchez. It was built in in Baltimore, Maryland , named Natchez by some merchants, until the government of Brazil bought it from them, and converted it for military use. It collided with another ship in Brazil on November 21, , and sank. Celebrated race of the steamers Robert E. Lee and Natchez, Wooden figure from the Natchez. The engine order telegraph is on the left. Overhead throttles control the flow of steam to the two engines. The red lever overhead reverses the engines. The operator monitors steam pressure, condenser vacuum, and other parameters on the gauges.

Located on the Mississippi River, some 90 miles southwest of Jackson, the capital of Mississippi, and 85 miles north of Baton Rouge, Louisiana, it is the eighteenth-largest city in the state. It is named for the Natchez tribe of Native Americans who lived in the vicinity through the arrival of Europeans in the eighteenth century. Established by French colonists in , Natchez is one of the oldest and most important European settlements in the lower Mississippi River Valley, and served as the capital of the Mississippi Territory and then the state of Mississippi. It predates Jackson, which replaced Natchez as the capital in , by more than a century. The strategic location of Natchez, on a bluff overlooking the Mississippi River, ensured that it would become a pivotal center of trade, commerce, and the interchange of Native American, European, and African-American cultures in the region for the first two centuries of its existence. It was the southern terminus of the historic Natchez Trace, which provided many pilots of flatboats and keelboats a road back to their homes in the Ohio River Valley after unloading their cargo in the city. Today Natchez serves in the same capacity for the modern Natchez Trace Parkway, which commemorates this route. In the middle of the nineteenth century, the city became the home of a collection of extremely wealthy Southern planters, who owned vast tracts of land in the surrounding lowlands of Mississippi and Louisiana where they grew huge crops of cotton and sugar cane using slave labor.

Natchez became the principal port from which these crops were exported, both upriver to Northern cities and downriver to New Orleans, where much of the cargo was exported to Europe. Agriculture remained the primary economic sustenance for the region until well into the twentieth century. Despite its status as a popular tourist destination for much of its preserved aspects of antebellum culture, Natchez has experienced a general decline in population since
