Marijuana interferes with the metabolism of many drugs, including some chemotherapies, and can affect how effective these drugs are. That means, legally speaking, your doctor cannot write you a prescription for cannabis. Instead, your doctor can write an endorsement, attestation or certification of the possible efficacy of medical marijuana in treating your particular condition Cannabis and Cannabinoid Research, Volume 1. However, not all physicians will be comfortable with signing a certificate. In many states, there are certain physicians available to review your individual case for a medical marijuana card. To apply for a card, the attestation of a doctor is required. Each state will charge a different fee for the card. Information on legal limits and state requirements can be found here. Be sure to scroll down the page for full information. It is best to have a provider who is comfortable and informed, because there may be an interaction with other treatment options you are pursuing. The impact of medical marijuana on your treatment Regardless of whether or not marijuana is legal in your state, it is important to tell your doctor if and how you use marijuana, either recreationally or medically, and the frequency of your use. As we mentioned before, marijuana interferes with the metabolism of many drugs, including chemotherapeutic agents and herbal supplements. Marijuana is metabolized in the liver as are many chemotherapy agents. Should you take medical marijuana instead of or along with conventional therapy? If you are using cannabis in place of conventional therapy, you should definitely notify your doctor. As of now, there is no evidence to suggest it should be used as a treatment in and of itself. In some situations, the window of opportunity for a potential cure may close when their cancer progresses on cannabis alone. If you or someone you love is considering medical marijuana, do your research, look at the references we provide, talk with others, and speak with your doctor. The Colon Cancer Alliance does not endorse or recommend any specific treatment or screening method for colorectal cancer; rather we serve as a source of scientifically accurate medical information to help empower patients and their caregivers to make informed decisions in consultation with their health professionals.
