At the start of a new series, characters continuing on will change their main outfit entirely. This is a list of the different clothing and outfits worn by the main characters. They often strongly feature the colors red and blue, along with black, white, green and golden yellow. This fact is also echoed by the outfits of Brock and Misty, which were designed purely for the anime instead of using the outfits seen in the games themselves, and also the artwork for the games. The upper outfit is a medium blue jacket with gold trim and white collar and sleeves, worn open over a dark cyan or teal t-shirt. Ash also wears green finger-less gloves with light green borders, and of course, his hat. This was very much the case early in his journey in Kanto, though by the time his journey in Johto ended, he hardly ever turned his cap. He has a green backpack with a yellow square label and slings with black adjusters on it. The backpack has two pockets and two open compartments on each side. The main, bigger pocket is delimited by a black zip fastener, while the external pocket has an orange stripe on it. Along with a new hat, Ash wore a hoodie instead of a jacket, black gloves instead of green, and new jeans and sneakers. However, he keeps the hoodie closed, possibly because he no longer keeps Badges pinned to the inside. All of his new clothes, however, bear a notable resemblance to his old clothes, probably to maintain his style and avoid confusion which would be caused by a completely new appearance. This becomes a common theme among all new outfits: Ash wore this outfit from Hoenn Alone! Ash has worn this outfit in more different series than any other, wearing it during three different series. His third outfit takes a step back to his first outfit by wearing a jacket instead of a hoodie, and with colors closer to the original. It also has a white undershirt instead of black for a change, as well as a new hat, new jeans, and new sneakers. The gloves are the same as those from his second outfit. The primary differences are the hat designs, sneakers, backpack color, and the fact that Ash wears open fingered gloves, but no scarf. However, given how long it is now, it is more difficult to tell. Outfit changes are now accepted as routine if and when the anime changes sagas. Instead of blue jeans, Ash starts to wear black baggy jeans and wears a hooded jacket just like in AG, colored mostly blue and white along with a yellow zipper. He wears black finger-less gloves but the border is red. Ash uses a backpack instead of a satchel, like his Best Wishes outfit. Ash wears red high top sneakers, similar to those worn in the Best Wishes series, and darker blue jeans. The gloves are the same as those from his fourth outfit. In general, the outfit heavily borrows characteristics from Red and Calem. Ash wore this outfit from The Dream Continues! This is the second outfit that Ash has worn in more than one series, namely two. His shoes are blue and are modeled after those worn by people to stand in water. He also wears a Z-Ring on his left wrist. Ash started wearing this outfit in Alola to New Adventure! His hat now bears a logo similar to the one he has on his Sun and Moon series hat, except it is colored green and a part of the upper section is missing, which gives it a similar appearance to the old logo. His jacket was also given a few changes. It is a different shade of blue, it now has pockets that are horizontal rather than diagonal, the white collar is slightly smaller, the gold trim on the bottom is now just a small stripe, and there is now just a single top button instead of the original two. His black and white sneakers are less detailed and lack the red dots. Besides continuing to wear the same hat that he wore in the previous movie, this outfit consists of a light-blue and white jacket with a large red collar, which in turn has a single yellow line across the center, and a similarly-colored trim at the bottom of said jacket. His jacket is kept open to reveal a black shirt, looser-fitting than that of his previous outfit. The bottom half has him sporting grey capri shorts with a thin white line coming down both sides, and blue sneakers with orange laces. His usual fingerless gloves are black with a blue line across the cuff.

Four-year-old Ying-ying, who has fallen overboard, is desperate to be "found" – to once again be reunited with her family – and with herself. She feels as though she has not only lost her family, but that she has also lost her "self. In contrast to that loss and eventual reclamation, Ying-ying explains that today, as an old lady, she realizes that she and her daughter have suffered similar losses, and she wonders if these losses will ever be recovered. She and her daughter can no longer hear one another because Ying-ying rarely voices her thoughts. It was not always so; on the night when she was four years old, she shared her thoughts with the Moon Lady. The Moon Festival fell on a very hot autumn day. Ying-ying remembers that her amah told her that soon they would see Chang-o, the Moon Lady, who becomes visible on this day only, and when people see her, they can ask for one secret wish to be fulfilled. The Moon Lady is not an ordinary person, the amah explained. Ying-ying recalls that the departure was delayed because the adults talked. She became increasingly restless until, finally, the servants began to load a rickshaw with provisions, and the family climbed aboard and departed for the river. Arriving at the lake, they discover that the air is no cooler there than it was inland. The children race around the deck of the floating pavilion, delighting in the ornate decorations, the pretty garden area, and the bustling kitchen. The excitement wanes, however, and after the meal, everyone settles down for a nap. Ying-ying watches some boys send a shackled bird into the water to catch fish. Later, she watches a servant gut fish, chickens, and a turtle, and, with alarm, she realizes that her new outfit is flecked with blood and fish scales. Panicking, she rubs more turtle blood over her clothing, thinking that no one will notice her transformation. The amah shrieks in terror when she sees Ying-ying covered with blood but gratefully strips off the soiled garments when she realizes that the child is unharmed. Alone on the back of the boat in her undergarments, Ying-ying waits as the moon rises. She turns to find the Moon Lady and slips into the water. She is caught in a fishing net and dumped on the deck of another boat. She is put on shore, where she watches the Moon Lady performing. Instantly, she is enchanted by the pageant and by the beautiful, soft-spoken Moon Lady. When the play ends, the Moon Lady announces that she will grant a wish. Ying-ying rushes backstage and there, she sees the Moon Lady pull off her hair, drop her gown, and she realizes that the Moon Lady is a man. Although Ying-ying is rescued by her family, she never believes that she is the same girl. She also forgets many of the details of the day. Today, many years later, when her life is coming to an end, she finally remembers what she asked the Moon Lady: Note that Ying-ying felt that she had surrendered herself "to a shadow, insubstantial and fleeting. Stripped of her special tiger clothes and wearing only anonymous cotton undergarments, Ying-ying could be anyone. The phenomenon of the doppelganger, according to psychologists, is fairly common. People feel as though they have met – or seen – their "double," a life-sized mirror image of themselves. Most often, these experiences happen late at night or at dawn and occur during periods of stress and fatigue. This idea of a phantom "double" has existed for centuries. In this case, Ying-ying sees a little girl who is safe; at the same time, she is trying to reinstate herself on shore, as a safe little girl who did not fall in the water. Writers have long used this literary device to probe conflicts within characters, struggles that the characters may not even know they are having. One dark night, a young sea captain rescues a murderer – his double – from the ocean. The captain hides his double and has visions of his own darker side. Here, Ying-ying is torn between her antithetical desires for both independence and belonging. First, there is the shadow. Then it will come to you and hide in the comfort of your shadow. The image of a shadow also echoes the phenomenon of the doppelganger. In some ways, Ying-ying is like the bird with the ring around its neck, but she is shackled by psychological rather than by physical means. Ying-ying has repressed her identity for so many years that she is unable to communicate with her daughter.
