Updated October 28, 0 There is so much misinformation out there on what it takes to be a great girlfriend. Understanding how men think and what they need in a relationship makes an enormous difference in the way you are able to relate to one another. The top prerequisite for being in a great relationship is to be your best self. A trap that many people in relationships fall into is blaming their partner when problems arise. Rather than seeing what they can do to make things better, they blame him for not being what they want and think that if only he did XYZ, then everything would be fine. All you can do is bring your best. When you do this, the other person will usually rise up and match you at this level. Here are six ways to be the most amazing girlfriend ever

1. The man, in turn, gets frustrated that nothing he does seems to be good enough. Eventually he gets discouraged and stops trying and she feels even more resentful. Men do not pick up on nuances and subtleties in the same way women do, they need things spelled out in a clear and direct manner. If you tell a guy something he is doing that is upsetting or hurting you in a loving, compassionate way, I guarantee he will try to fix it. Freud is regarded as one of the most brilliant minds in psychology and even he had no idea what women want, so how do you expect the average guy to do it? Most arguments in relationships stem from deeper underlying issues that never get discussed or resolved. From there a big fight may ensue over something trivial while the real issue goes untouched. The problem is that we usually love others the way we like to feel love. Women typically feel loved when a man is being giving and attentive to her and her needs. What a man deeply desires is feeling acknowledged and appreciated for what he provides. He wants to feel like his efforts were a success—this applies to everything he does from taking you out for a fancy dinner to taking out the trash. If he takes you out on a nice date, acknowledge and appreciate him for it and tell him you had an amazing time. Men are typically more responsive to compliments about something they have done rather than who they are. Another important relationship skill is to try and see the intention behind an action, and appreciate that. I have a personal example for this. Years ago I was dating a guy and one night he called and asked if he could come over. Where could he be? Why is he even bothering to come over this late? Why do I have to wait up for him when I just need sleep! He finally showed up carrying something that smelled delicious. The mistake I made was in looking at the action him being late, rather than the intention him wanting to do something nice to me happy. While women typically seek out their friends and want to talk about it, men would rather retreat into the proverbial man cave and deal with it on their own. If your boyfriend seems stressed and begins to withdraw, just let him be. If he wants to talk about it with you, he will. They get into a relationship and the guy becomes the sole center of their universe. This is never healthy! For one thing, it kind of puts your relationship in a holding pattern and creates a scenario where you can be dating for years and years without taking the next step. Another reason not maintaining your own life outside of the relationship is problematic is you may end up staying in a bad relationship for far longer than you should have because, well, you have nothing else to go back to anything. Men typically fall in love with a woman in her absence, not her presence. It gives you a break from the emotional intoxication of relationships so you can see things more objectively and it takes some pressure off the relationship so it can unfold more organically. Take Care of Yourself.

Email Copy Link Copied I think we all want to be the best girlfriend that our boyfriend has ever had. We want to be extra special to him and basically the one that he compares all his exes to. I take great pride in the way I treat my boyfriends. I really believe they deserve the absolute best and I also love the way they brag to all of their friends about how fantastic I am as a girlfriend. I made mistakes and definitely regret some of my choices in my past relationships. You also have to be an understanding person when it comes to the way he acts and when he messes up. Unfortunately, us girlfriends have a tendency to nag our boyfriends to do certain things from time to time and believe me when I say they hate it. Ditch the nagging and opt for some motivation. Give him a reason to do the things you want him to. Tell him he looks so manly when you see him cleaning the counters. These are all subtle ways to get him to do what you want without annoying him with your nagging. We could be perfectly fine one minute and in a sour mood the next simply because our boyfriends said something that set us off. Our triggers make zero sense to them. So instead of moping around for the rest of the night, deeply sighing every time he comes around, just tell him how you feel. The minute he does something that upsets you just speak your mind and tell him that it makes you mad when he does that. When you specifically tell him that he should take a Friday night and hit the town with his boys instead of taking you on a fancy date he will practically shower you with affection. Guys have a special â€” and sometimes just plain weird â€” relationship with their friends. Since he has now devoted so much more time to you and so much less with his friends, he values time with them much more. By encouraging him to go spend time with his friends you are showing him that you understand the need for his friends and are willing to give up your time with him so he can be happy. So when your boyfriend walks in the house stomping his feet and cussing up a storm, never ask him what is wrong. He needs to be able to process his anger in private and will only be agitated more by your consistent prying. In fact, that will only make him feel guilty. These small things will make him feel loved and will show him that you care about his happiness and are willing to put in the work just to see him smile. It will also give him something to brag about with his friends. When his friends voice their jealousy over him having such an awesome girlfriend it also makes you seem even better in his eyes. It takes a lot more planning and effort on their part to do something that will make you happy and you should always appreciate them and make a big deal about it when they do so. Make sure he knows just how much you love all that he does for you and always make a skeptical of his efforts.

He had more compassion and understanding and patience. It was something that really resonated with me. Yesterday proved that this was very true for my home, too. I stay at home so watching outside was easy she comes at the same time every day. I mean, come on, no one wants to wait for their Crate Club or Birch Box packages longer than necessary! He immediately walked away from his truck to check on her. I watched him as he helped her move boxes to pop the hood and he lifted it and went straight to trying to help her. I could tell by her body movements that she was very unhappy with who she was talking to on the phone. This amazing man of mine quickly gets her calmed down and actually ends up on the phone. He came back inside and we hear her outside trying to get our attention it was about 60 degrees so our windows and screen doors were open. I see her stare at his cruiser parked away and I immediately get defensive in my head. On his day off. At his own home! You can at least try not to look so disgusted when you look at that car! They talked for a second, she hands him her car key, and leaves. When he came back inside he told me what happened. Not once did he say anything bad about her. Not once did he criticize how she acted towards him. Not once did my normally teasing, sarcastic man make a jab or poke fun at what happened. He is absolutely better than I am. Even at home, in his sweatpants, he conducts himself with a professional attitude and a maturity level that far surpasses many I know. He represents the blue well, and he represents our household better than I do. The cruiser was parked in the driveway today.

Guess it was just instinct. Rainbow cracked a huge smile. The rest of the group all chuckled as they watched the two fly loops around each other. Where have you been? Starlight looked up into the sky as Rainbow and Spike both allowed Pinkie to join them in their sky stunts. You have classes to teach! I need you to help me in my office! Twilight deadpanned as she walked back into the school. W-what brings you three here? Rarity raised a brow. You sure you wanna have that? Hey, where is she? Applejack zipped in front of her again. Rarity looked behind her to see where she was pointing. She brought a cloud into her classroom! After a moment, Rainbow Dash and Spike dropped down in front of them. My wings finally grew in! The three of them, along with Apple Bloom and Sweetie Belle, slowly looked over at Scootaloo, whose eyes were bulging as her mouth also hung open. Her expression then fell into complete neutrality as she casually walked up to the fountain behind them. Her face was then introduced to the side. I tried to put in the two things everyone is likely thinkingâ€”Rainbow is gonna be psyched about Spike having his wings, and Scootaloo is going to be absolutely mortified that he can fly before her. Chapter 5 : COWGILL: John Asher remains, even though he's gone

The year-old hip hop artist says he's in a much happier place after almost having a "mental breakdown" over what people were saying about his sexuality.

We know we've known for weeks now that Cincinnati city council member P. Sittenfeld is running for the Democratic nomination to take on Portman next year. That the Youngstown Vindicator, late last month, reported that two unnamed sources close to Strickland were saying the former governor would run. And we know that Strickland, who left Ohio last year for Washington, D. C. But the GOP has definitely launched a pre-emptive strike on the former governor, who lost his re-election bid to Republican John Kasich in a close election in 2010. And the party machinery has pretty much been leaving Sittenfeld alone recently, focusing their attacks on Strickland. Meanwhile, the year-old Sittenfeld has been quietly putting together a campaign organization and raising money at a rather rapid clip. Sittenfeld has held at least two fundraisers earlier this month in Washington, D. C. In the meantime, Strickland the non-candidate candidate has been taking the GOP body blows in silence. This stuff is not likely to matter much in a Democratic U. S. Senate primary, if there is one. It might have an impact, though, if Strickland won that primary and faced Portman next fall. This is the way campaigns work these days the opposition starts attacking potential candidates, long before they have declared their candidacies. The Democrats at the national level are doing it too putting out daily press releases slamming various potential GOP presidential candidates. Strickland has brushed it off so far after all, he is not a candidate. Answering such charges in detail can wait. There was some speculation early on that Sittenfeld might get out of the race if the much better known and more experienced Strickland jumped in. Sittenfeld is definitely all in. Jerry Austin, a political consultant on Ohio and national campaigns for decades, says there is no reason for Sittenfeld to back off in favor of Strickland. Strickland is the past. He may decide he is not yet ready to be put to pasture.

Chapter 6 : He's A Natural! - ALREADY?? - Fimfiction

He is absolutely better than I am. Even at home, in his sweatpants, he conducts himself with a professional attitude and a maturity level that far surpasses many I know. Even when he was doing something that he doesn't normally have the time to do, he put it on hold to help someone he doesn't know.

You never know with mascots these days. Here are the details we can confirm from the team: Wingston boasts golden wings on either side of his delightfully oversized head. The presence of the red, black and silver jewels is in homage to the Wings rich history, representing the three reincarnations of the team, dating back to Dressed in his signature black, charcoal and red Wings jersey, game shorts and sneakers, Wingston is always ready for a catch or to take shots on net. Wingston represents Philadelphia well, sporting no. His unique ability to spin his head degrees around gives him an advantage over the competition, allowing him to see the game from every angle. Welcome to Philly, Wing bird! Wings, feathers, a tail, spinning its head around on a swivel. Sounds like a bird to me. Fans can see Wingston in action on Dec. Did I like the uniforms when they slowly began to leak before the official reveal? The jerseys felt like a letdown. Forget the digital mockups. The heather grey just pops when you see them on actual players and not some weird online mannequin. It looks like the Sixers are going to be draped in athleisure wear on the court. Let the Sixers be comfortable. Let them take the court swagged out with the DGAF attitude that comes with unnecessarily wearing sweatpants at every given opportunity. Let them look like a year old man from Port Richmond who believes he can shoot free throws better than Markelle Fultz. Give me those shorts with the Rocky-influenced title belt going around the waist. I will wear them every night to bed until I die. I will roll out of my bed on Christmas morning in this full uniform set, put on my Eagles Super Bowl Champions hat I put it on every day and watch basketball on my couch for 15 hours. I will watch the Sixers beat the Celtics, who are the most annoying basketball team in the universe, and I will feel more comfortable than I ever have previously in my life. Philadelphia, for better or worse, will always be Rocky, cheesesteaks and soft pretzels and now sweatpants. That will never change. If you asked some random year-old dude from Big Arm, Montana, if he knows what Philly looks like, he probably does just from the training montages in the original Rocky and Rocky II. And what does Rocky, who everyone under the age of 12 from South Philly believes actually exists, wear in the most iconic shots of our glorious city? Receive comprehensive coverage of your teams and stream the Flyers, Sixers and Phillies games easily on your device. More on the Sixers.
