The land was first owned by Nicholas Minor, who in divided his tract of land in Georgetown into lots for the beginning of the town of Leesburg. Four years later, Spece sold to John Miller. His son, Beverly Berryman Thornton, lived in the house until it was sold in to Francis Triplett, who kept its residential status. Triplett reconstructed the house, and erected the front two rooms of stone. The next change came in , when Eleanor and Henry Peers purchased the property and converted the house once again into an ordinary with the establishment of the Peers Hotel. The Peers Hotel was in operation until , when it closed after the death of Eleanor Peers, and the heirs sold the property to Daniel and Ellen Smith, who once more converted it to a residence. In , they sold it to Dr. Armistead Mott, an owner of the Mott and Pursell retail business, and his wife. Full ownership was transferred to his wife and daughter in Miss Virginia Mott continued to reside there until the mids. The name was chosen from a Loudoun unit in the Civil War that participated in the last cavalry charge of the war. In , owners Mrs. Ellen Wall and her brother, Roy Flippo added the gazebo and landscaped gardens designed to fit the era of the buildings. In late , the Laurel Brigade was purchased by Marquis Investment Group LLC, a Virginia company made up of Loudoun natives and longtime residents, for conversion to law and other professional offices. Marquis Investment Group and the renovation and restoration project was led by the late Joe S. Ritenour, a Loudoun attorney and entrepreneur. Great care was taken and extensive planning done to ensure, to the extent possible, that the historic integrity of the building was preserved during the work. Travostino moved into the renovated space in and have operated in the building ever since. Need Help with a Legal Matter? The regiment spent that year operating in the neighborhood of Harpers Ferry and Romney, West Virginia. The 7th Virginia Cavalry served with Gen. Here they were very active. In one 28 day period they fought 32 separate actions. Jackson called Ashby one of the finest partisan officers of the war. Rosser of the Laurel Brigade. The regimental commander for most of the war was Col. The 7th Virginia Cavalry was at Appomatox Court House in April , but many, before the Confederate lines were enveloped, succeeded in breaking through and were not forced to surrender. Disbanding and going home, the men tried to return to their post-war lives. The 7th Virginia Cavalry suffered casualties with killed during the war. Cav For the Entire War: B 1st - Howard Dragoons Howard Co. F - Hampshire Rifleman Hampshire Co. Reality The cavalrymen of the South generally viewed themselves as cavaliers [left] -- throwbacks to the mounted royalist horsemen of the English Civil Wars. There was a modest historic and geneological linkage between the aristocracy of England and some of the "Plantation Aristocracy" of the Old South, but most southern "blue blood" was aristocratic only because the southerners thought it was so. The reality [right] was much more sombering. Nonetheless, many southern cavalrymen grew poor in the service of their country. As Shakespeare writes in "Henry V," they sold the pasture to provide the horse. Both views proved grossly far from the truth. Captain Harry Gilmore Co. G, 7th Virginia Cavalry The camera does not lie. Captain Gilmore looks every bit the cavalier. Gilmore was an unusually active and undisciplined man. He claimed to be able to shoot apples from the heads of his friends. He lite-off a crate of fireworks at Federal pickets on Christmas Eve thereby provoking an artillery bombardment of his own lines. He was accidently shot in the hip during a bar room brawl in Winchester, VA two months later. He served in Co. A for a time ultimately raising his own company which was incorporated into the 12th VA Cavalry. After the war he served as police commissioner in Baltimore and wrote a book about his Civil War activities: Note the large fighting knife. Said to be from the 7th, but very little is known of him beyond his picture. Note the cavalry style overcoat. Major Harry Hatcher Co. He shot one of the men with his pistol. He received a bayonet wound at Buckton Station in May Harry Hatcher transferred to the Rangers of John S. Mosby in as a 1st Lieutenant. His tomstone reads, "Bravest of the Brave.
