Mont Vernon is a town in Hillsborough County, New Hampshire, United States. The population was 2, at the census. It is not clear why it is spelled differently from the many other towns in the United States named after Mount Vernon, the home of George Washington.

North from Town Hall c. It later added a small portion of neighboring Lyndeborough. Originally settled for agriculture, its farms were hard hit after the Civil War when railroads opened up better farming land in the Midwest. Population peaked in 1880 and began to decline. At one point it had five large summer hotels, including the Grand Hotel, located on top of Grand Hill. The hotel business began to wither with the development of the automobile, which allowed tourists to reach places like the White Mountains of New Hampshire, and it was killed by the Great Depression. The remaining hotels were torn down before World War II. Since the war, Mont Vernon has slowly become a suburban community. This was significantly accelerated in 1950 when engineers and technicians employed at Sanders Associates in Nashua found homes in Mont Vernon attractive. Some bought dormant farms, some homes in the village. All brought a willingness to pay more taxes to improve the schools. The active farms were squeezed out and eventually only the Pomeroy farm survived. Agriculture, including a boom in chicken and egg farming, has all but disappeared. As of 2000, the town has one dairy farm. For years, the only store in town was the General Store, which closed in the late winter of 2000. There are currently a handful of retail and other businesses in the town. Demographics Edit Congregational Church c. The population density was 100.
